"It," the letter proceeds, "is now a month since I have been here. I was getting on so slowly in Marysville that I thought I would come to San Francisco to have an operation performed to see why the principal bone in my leg did not unite. After lying upon my back in Marysville for 103 days, it was time I think. Besides, my physicians there and myself differed as to the cause, and being confident that my leg would not get well for a year, perhaps, with their let-alone treatment, I concluded to have it cut down upon and thoroughly examined. Dr. Cooper, an acquaintance of mine, and an excellent surgeon, in whom I have much confidence, has charge of my case. At my request, and in the presence of some dozen or more physicians, he operated. An incision seven inches long was made upon the inner surface of the leg, then another at right angles; the flesh was carefully dissected from the bone throughout that extent, so as fully to expose the fracture, etc. The bones were pried apart, and eight pieces of bone of different sizes removed. The ends were then well scraped, and after drilling six holes three silver wires were introduced to bring and hold the ends together. The operation was a severe one, but I bore it without taking chloroform. I had suffered so much with the leg, and being anxious to get well, I could have stood any sort of operation. It is now thirty-five days since the operation, and I shall get up to-day week—confident this time that all is right, for the bone has united and all is firm. It will be a month or so after I get up before I will be able to walk without my crutches. I feel first-rate, and enjoy my time in bed as well as any body could, for I let nothing disturb my mind. Agreeable books and cheerful company, of which I have enough, keep me quite busy."

A FINGER FOR A LIFE.

The Keokuk Journal of the 23d relates this incident: "At the Lincoln meeting in Carthage, Illinois, yesterday, Captain Appler, of this place, was there with his field-piece firing a salute, which he had been employed by the Republicans to do. The powder being bad, in the course of the firing the gun went off prematurely. James Lynch was at the muzzle, ramming the cartridge, when it ignited. Captain Appler, who was at the vent, finding a premature discharge was inevitable, called 'Get away, Jim!' holding on to the vent till the fire burned his finger off up to the first joint, and until Lynch had escaped the range of the ramrod. It is seldom, in chronicling an incident of this kind, that we find men possessing the nerve and heroic fortitude that Captain Appler displayed on this occasion to save his friend from an untimely death. Both were considerably burned by powder, but neither dangerously hurt."

AN INTERNATIONAL CRICKET MATCH.

A New York correspondent of the Boston Atlas says: "A national cricket match—none of your 'eleven of Canada against eleven of New York'—but a regular top-lofty affair, between the United States and England, is now on the tapis, as the public will now for the first time learn through your columns. Although this match has been for some time talked about in the cricketical circles, it was not until Monday, November 1, that a formal meeting was held to take it into consideration. The St. George's Club was convened on Monday evening last, for the purpose of taking the initiatory steps to bring about the proposed match. Last summer the Secretary addressed a note to the 'Lords' Club, Marylebone,' to ascertain whether and upon what terms the best eleven of England would visit the United States, for the purpose of playing a friendly match. An answer came that they would come over for one hundred pounds sterling per man—enough to pay passage to and fro and expenses—the party to consist of thirteen persons—eleven players, one umpire, and one scorer. Your English readers are aware, though your Puritan readers probably are not, that the eleven of the Lords' Club are regarded as the best in the realm. They do nothing but play cricket, and earn, on an average, from four to five pounds a week. It is understood that if the proposed match comes off, the eleven will be composed of six or seven professionals and four or five young sprigs of nobility. The St. George's Club propose to raise seven thousand dollars to defray the hospitalities, and have resolved to do it. Letters were directed to be written to Lord Napier and Mr. Archibald, the British Consul, soliciting their donations and co-operation. Should favorable answers be received, they will impart to the affair additional eclat. If not, it will nevertheless go on; for the J. Bulls have made up their minds that the thing must go, and go it will."

AN INCIDENT OF THE NEW ORLEANS EPIDEMIC.

The New Orleans Delta relates the following, as one of the incidents of the yellow fever epidemic in that city: A boy was discovered in the morning lying in the grass of Claiborne Street, evidently bright and intelligent, but sick. A man who had the feelings of kindness strongly developed went to him, shook him by the shoulder, and asked him what he was doing there. "Waiting for God to come for me," said he. "What do you mean?" said the gentleman, touched by the pathetic tone of the answer and the condition of the boy, in whose eye and flushed face he saw the evidences of the fever. "God sent for mother, and father, and little brother," said he, "and took them away to his home, up in the sky; and mother told me, when she was sick, that God would take care of me. I have no home, nobody to give me any thing; and so I came out here, and have been looking so long up in the sky for God to come and take care of me, as mother said he would. He will come, won't he? Mother never told me a lie." "Yes, my lad," said the man, overcome with emotion, "he has sent me to take care of you."

A DROLL BET ON THE ELECTION.

The Batavia Herald has the following: "Harry Wilber and Mr. Hascall of the first part, and Thomas Yates of the second part, in the heat and ardor of the political confidence, yesterday, they had of the success of their candidates—Morgan and Parker—unitedly staked the strength of their confidence in the following wager: The parties of the first part were to give their check on the Bank of Genesee for the sum of $50, as wager first; and the said parties of the first part were to draw a two-horse wagon-load of unhusked corn into Ellicott Hall, in the evening of yesterday, and, with the party of the second part, were to husk it out during the evening; and if the parties' first aforesaid candidate (Parker) loses his election in the State, the said first parties should forfeit or yield to the said second party the $50 wager, and wheel in a wheel-barrow all of said husked corn, with their own hands, to the house of the said second party, as wager second. And so, vice versa. Hence, we may now expect soon to see Harry, with his colleague, to the music of Gardner's Band, wheeling our friend Thomas some corn for his pigs.

"Since committing the above to type, Harry and Hascall, like wheel-barrow veterans, have begun rolling the corn up to Thomas, led on by Gardner's Band, playing, first, 'Pop Goes the Weasel,' and ending up with 'Yankee Doodle,' loud enough to burst their drum-heads and split their fifes."

TOM CORWIN'S LAST.

The Ohio Press says: "At a trial recently held at Yellow Springs, growing out of a difficulty between some of the students and faculty of Antioch, the 'Old Wagon Boy,' who represented the faculty, was exhibiting to the jury a foil or cane, belonging to one of the students, which was probably used in the melee. Tom was in his usual happy mood, and brought down the house frequently by his witty illustrations of the noble science of fencing—now parrying imaginary thrusts, and anon throwing himself fiercely upon the attack. At last, having exhausted his full store of pleasantries, with one fell thrust he made feint to strike one of the students, Mr. Fisher, who sat near by, and, with look of unfathomable gloom and the voice of a Stentor, he thundered out, 'And what would you do, Sir, being unarmed, if I should attempt to pierce you through?' Imagine the roar of laughter which greeted this last eloquent effort of the 'old stumper' when the half-frightened student, collecting again his wits, sprang to his feet, and successfully mimicking Corwin's most bombastic style, exclaimed, 'I'd welcome you, Sir, with bloody hands to a hospitable grave.'"

SHOT WITH WATER.

A young German of Chicago, named Simon, says the Press of that city, committed suicide on Saturday last in the following strange manner: He went into a shed, took a gun, and loading it with water, placed the muzzle in his mouth and fired, completely shattering his head. When found he was standing in the corner leaning on his gun. The room presented a terrible appearance, being completely drenched with blood and covered with pieces of head and brains. The cause of the suicide is traced to the refusal of Simon's father to permit him to marry the girl of his choice. The same paper chronicles the death of a child at the public school by the fall[illegible]ing of a keg of nails upon his head from the roof of the school-house, which is undergoing repairs.

PERSONAL.

The Boston Traveler says: "Letters recently received from Mr. Sumner represent his health as being consid[illegible]ably improved. He writes that the physicians at A[illegible] will probably attribute his improvement to the bath[illegible] Dr. Brown Sequard will think it the result of the mo[illegible] and his friends at home may suppose that relaxation from labor is the cause; but of the fact that he is mu[illegible] improved in health there is no doubt. He was ab[illegible] leaving Aix for Paris when last heard from." The B[illegible]ton Herald has the following: "A New Bedford gen[illegible] man, who has recently returned from Europe, states it [illegible] be the opinion of Mr. Sumner's physicians that he [illegible] never recover from the effect of the injuries from wh[illegible] he has been suffering for over two years. His men[illegible] and physical system is much shaken, and, although [illegible] may survive for years, there is little probability that [illegible] will ever be able to resume the duties of public life."

The post of Consul to Trieste, one of the most valua[illegible] in the gift of the President, is bestowed upon Mr. Re[illegible] of Philadelphia.

M. H. Bovee, who, as a Senator of Wisconsin, was [illegible]ive and prominent in effecting the abolition of the D[illegible] Penalty in that State, is about to canvass the State [illegible] Illinois in advocacy of the Anti-capital Punishm[illegible] cause.

On Monday afternoon, as Mr. Josiah Quincy, Sen[illegible] Boston, was crossing Park Street, at its junction [illegible] Tremont Street, he was knocked down by a carriage, [illegible] wheels of which passed over his legs. No bones [illegible] broken, however, neither was Mr. Quincy seriously [illegible]jured, though his head was badly cut at the back of [illegible] right ear, in consequence of its contact with one of [illegible] sharp pavements. After a few hours of rest Mr. Q[illegible] became quite comfortable, and no fears of a serio[illegible] sult are entertained by his physicians. He will be [illegible] the streets as usual in a day or two.

Perley Poore writes from Washington to the B[illegible] Journal: "Miss Lane has not yet returned from [illegible] to Philadelphia. Mr. Corcoran and daughter will [illegible] the winter at Cuba. Governor W. B. Laurence, of R[illegible] Island, is here, an applicant, on dit, for a foreign [illegible]sion. THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH TO BE WORKED AT LAST.

The following is an extract from a letter from Mr. Whitehouse in the London papers:

"I have not tested nor in any way examined the state of the cable since my return to Valentia, nor shall I, of course, do so, after all that has passed, until I receive definite permission from the Directors for such examination to be made by me.

"It is, therefore, from previous observations, and from a careful review of all that has occurred since my departure from Valentia, that I now state my strong conviction that our cable is recoverable—readily recoverable; and if such opinion be correct, the reopening of communication with America will at once follow the adoption of the proper measures.

"A few days' testing, guided by the experience gained during the manufacture and subsequent use of the cable, will in all probability enable me to ascertain this beyond doubt.

"If the result of this examination be such as to satisfy my own judgment, I shall then be prepared to make to the Company the following offer:

"I will undertake at my own cost, and at my own risk, to reopen communication with Newfoundland, and, further, to maintain it for a given number of years, at a moderate percentage upon the gross receipts of the Company, this being payable so long only as the line shall be kept by me in good working order.

"I now, therefore, request the Directors' permission for such examination of the cable as shall be necessary to enable me to make an offer in the terms above stated.

"I am, etc., G. O. Wildman Whitehouse,
"Late Electrician to the Atlantic Telegraph Company."

THE QUEEN'S SONS SETTING UP IN LIFE.

A London paper contains the following: "The Prince of Wales, attended by Major Lindsay, went down to Portsmouth on Wednesday last, to see Prince Alfred off. The parting between the royal brothers was very affectionate, and the royal cadet seemed also much moved at parting with his old friends and instructors—Dr. Minter, of the royal yacht, and Naval Instructor Jolly, of the Illustrious. The latter gentleman is now appointed tutor to Prince Arthur.

"The young sailor Prince seemed in the best of spirits, and at once at home with the young gentlemen selected (for no officer has been appointed to the Euryalus, we believe, whose character and merits have not first been submitted for her Majesty's approval) to be his compagnons de voyage. Mr. Walton, of Gosport, was honored by her Majesty's commands to fit out the young Prince; and it may be interesting to those young gentlemen who are studying to enter the navy, and others already admitted and serving, to know that Prince Alfred will enjoy no immunity from his royal rank, that his outfit is no better nor more extensive than theirs, that his chest is the exact and strict 'regulation' article, and if his servant has a cabin allotted him, the Prince, his master, slings his hammock on the lower deck, and berths himself therein the same as the other cadets, and with the same chance of 'cobbing,' though probably not with the like probability of receiving that introductory infliction. Her Majesty had the Prince's chest and outfit sent up to Buckingham Palace for her own and the Prince Consort's inspection, and on its return to Mr. Walton on Wednesday for shipment, the Queen and Prince were both pleased to express their high satisfaction with the equipment. The chest is of polished oak, and the toilet utensils white metal electro-plated. The kit was of the usual character, and no superfluities.

"The Prince of Wales will shortly receive a commission in and join the army."

FEARFUL ACCIDENT TO A YOUNG LADY.

The neighborhood of Clifton was thrown into a state of the most painful excitement, in consequence of the death of a young lady, the daughter of a clergyman residing in the neighboring county of Gloucester, under circumstances of the most appalling description. The young lady in question, Miss Mary Richmond, was about eighteen years of age, and is understood to be a granddaughter of the Rev. Leigh Richmond. Miss Richmond was on a visit to a connection of her family, residing near Richmond Park, Clifton. On Friday she was observed to wander to a cliff, called "The Lion's-head Cliff," which stands at an elevation of upward of three hundred feet from the road below, and from which is obtained magnificent views of the Avon, the Hot-wells, the Leigh Woods, Ashton, and the surrounding scenery. From this tremendous height the unhappy young lady fell. The precise circumstances which led to the terrible accident are differently stated; but that it was an accident, and not, as at first stated, a suicide, there can be no reasonable doubt. According to one statement, Miss Richmond was absorbed in the perusal of a book, and that she unconsciously walked over the edge of the precipice; another account states that she was endeavoring to gather one of the rock plants which grow in the crevices of the limestone formation, and that in her efforts to reach it she overbalanced herself, and so fell. In her descent she was observed to beat against the projecting points of the cliff, and, finally, to pitch on her head on the winding road which skirts the river. Assistance was at once afforded, but the unfortunate young lady was beyond the reach of any human aid, having been dashed almost literally to pieces. Her face was shockingly torn and mangled, her lower jaw being broken and forced in on one side, several of her ribs and her arms and thighs broken, and the flesh of her legs torn and lacerated. This is the fourth or fifth accident of the kind which, during the last twenty years, has occurred from the same cliff.

BULL-TAMING EXTRAORDINARY.

A Nottingham paper says: "His Grace the Duke of Portland, highly approving of the system of Mr. Rarey, in reference to the taming of horses, sent his groom, Mr. James Thompson, to undergo a course of instruction under that eminent master. Since Mr. Thompson's return to Welbeck he has tried the system on a valuable but very vicious bull, an Alderney, and which had become almost unmanageable, and even a terror to his keeper. He practiced a short time on him in his shed, and then took him into the open park. After operating on the bull for a short time, Mr. Thompson and two friends each lay down between his legs, the beast having nothing attached to him except a cord to his nose. He was as tractable and docile as a child.

MR. BRIGHT AND THE EMPRESS OF RUSSIA.

A curious incident happened to Mr. Bright while at Nice. One morning he unexpectedly received a visit from the chamberlain of the Empress Dowager of Russia, then residing there, and who expressed a wish that he should be presented to her. As he was much out of health at the time, he asked permission for one of his family to accompany him, which was at once granted, and both were conducted next day into the Imperial presence. The aged and worn widow of Nicholas desired them to be seated, and then, in terms of much dignity and grace, thanked him for the part he and his friends had taken in the Parliament of England in the endeavor to avert the Crimean war. The rugged nature of the Lancashire manufacturer was not wholly proof against the penetrating accents of unavailing grief thus addressed to him; and his eyes filled with tears as he expressed, in reply, his gratification at learning from such lips that the efforts of himself and his friends had been appreciated in Russia.

ILLNESS OF THE REV. MR. SPURGEON.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon has been attacked with a very painful disease—inflammation of the kidneys—and a few days ago his life was all but despaired of. His medical advisers have given it as their opinion that no danger now exists, but he is prohibited from preaching just yet. The following is the copy of a letter addressed to his congregation:

"Beloved friends and kindred in Christ.—The days seem like weeks, and the weeks seem like months, since I went up to the house of the Lord. My heart and my flesh are crying out for the assembly of the saints. Oh, how I long to hear once more the solemn shout of the festal throng who with the voice of joy and praise keep holy day!

"I am slowly rallying. My great struggle now is with weakness. I feel as if my frail bark had weathered a heavy storm which has made every timber creak. Do not attribute this illness to my having labored too hard for my Master. For His dear sake, I would that I may yet be able to labor more. Such toils as might be hardly noticed in the camp for the service of one's country would excite astonishment in the church for the service of our God.

"And now I entreat you, for love's sake, to continue in prayer for me. When ye find access to God, remember me. Mind, it is not by the words of your mouth, nor yet by the cravings of your heart, but it is by the precious blood of Christ, you must draw nigh to God. And when ye find His sweet presence, and are bedewed with His holy anointing, then pour out your souls before Him, and make mention of me in your supplications.

"Yours to love and serve in the Gospel,
"C. H. Spurgeon.

FRANCE.

PROSECUTION OF COUNT MONTALEMBERT.

The Moniteur announces that the journal entitled the Correspondent has been seized for an article by Count de Montalembert on England and India, and that a prosecution is to be instituted against the writer and publisher, who are accused of attacks against the principle of universal suffrage, the authority which the Emperor is invested with by the Constitution, and the respect due to the laws. They are further charged with attempting to excite the people to hatred and contempt of the Government, and endeavoring to disturb the public peace. The article in question contains strong language. In one place the Count says: "Finding the foul marasmus creeping over me, my ears tingling with the low tittle-tattle of ante-chambery and the yells of fanatics who think themselves our masters, or hypocrites who think we are their dupes, suffocated by the servile and corrupting miasmata of a loathsome atmosphere, I left France for England to take a bath of fresh air."

In another place he says: "Returning to France I find, in L'Univers, 23d May, 1858, Parliamentary Government styled a farce, with scenic decorations. Happy country, and happy clergy, whose organ gives such sound information in such decorous phraseology."

The prosecution of so distinguished a man as the Count de Montalembert was expected to produce considerable excitement, and it was regarded as an indication of great confidence in its own strength by the Government.

ROSSINI'S NEW HOME.

The Paris municipality have offered Rossini a most eligible site, planted with full-grown trees, in the delightful suburb of Passy, where he is about to construct an Italian villa. The maestro had found his native Bologna insufferably dreary, dismal, and dull; nor is that to be wondered at while the present nightmare suffocates all human activity in that devoted town. He tried Florence; but that city he found a vast caravansera of passing strangers, without a permanent circle of social enjoyment. Paris has fulfilled all his requirements, and he erects his tent in that metropolis of taste, refinement, and intellectual as well as artistic cultivation.

A NEW OPERA-HOUSE AT PARIS.

A Paris letter-writer says: "It is now, I believe, quite certain that the Emperor has resolved to build a new opera-house. A year ago, when the pretty Hôtel d'Osmond, opposite the Rue de la Paix, was pulled down, a report that the new opera was to be built on the site was indignantly denied by authority. Nevertheless there was much foundation for the report, and the scheme for establishing the new opera there is even yet on the tapis. A rival project is, however, under consideration for building an opera-house on the south side of the Place de la Concorde, which would harmonize, in point of architecture, with the Ministry of Marine on the opposite side.

WHETHER HOOPS ARE TO BE ABOLISHED OR NO.

A letter from Paris contains the following: "It was said, some time ago, that when the Queen and the Empress met at Cherbourg their Majesties had a solemn deliberation on the grave question whether or not the doom of crinoline should be sealed, and the august personages came to the conclusion that at the end of the winter it should be. Whether this on dit were true or false I can not take on myself to affirm; but I have heard on excellent authority that the Empress and some of her ladies have lately been engaged in making all manner of experiments on dress, as regards form, and development, and color; and that the result is that they have determined before long to inaugurate a violent reaction to the present style—that is to say, to have dresses short enough to display the foot and ankle, instead of trailing on the ground; to diminish immensely their prodigious development; and in place of colors more or less staid to have the brightest and gayest hues imaginable."

NEW PARISIAN MANIA.

A Paris correspondent of the Philadelphia Bulletin says: "The fashionable clubs have got a new hobby. Large wagers are laid on the exit of promenades performed from one given point to another in Paris, on foot, by one of the members of said clubs—the difficulty consisting in the walking the distance blindfolded. Thus, it is not unusual to meet, on a fine starry night, a number of persons escorting one of these adventurous wights. A Mr. de St. R—— wagered one thousand francs against thirty thousand that he would walk blindfolded from the Bastile to the Madeleine; and after overcoming the numberless difficulties and obstacles such a feat presented, he succeeded in winning the bet, having, very probably for the first time in his life, earned his money by the sweat of his brow."

PAUL MORPHY'S ENGAGEMENTS.

We read in the Times: "From a letter dated Paris, October 20, from Paul Morphy, the young champion of American chess, we learn that it is the intention of Mr. Morphy to meet Anderssen and Lange, who propose to play with him in Paris during the holidays, if he can possibly remain there so long. Mr. Morphy's immediate return home is desired, it is said, by his relatives at New Orleans. Mr. D. W. Fiske, a member of the New York Chess Club, informs us that the statement which has been published to the effect that Mr. Von der Lasa, the Prussian Minister at Rio de Janeiro, was going to Paris to play with Morphy is incorrect. Letters recently received from Mr. Von der Lasa state that it would be impossible for him to leave Rio de Janeiro at present, and that if he could he would not go to Paris to play with Morphy, whom he considers and acknowledges to be a better chess-player than himself."

AN UNGRATEFUL DANSEUSE.

A truly Parisian anecdote of a danseuse, a bouquet, rich lace, and a prodigal count, we find in a late French paper. M. le Comte de M——, one of the many admirers of the brilliant star in the constellation of the ballet at the Grand Opera, Madame X——, desiring to furnish her with a new evidence of his infatuation, caused to be procured a magnificent bouquet, composed of the choicest and most expensive flowers, arranged with consummate taste. In order to preserve his gift-offering from the banalites of Parma violets, moss-roses, or camelias, he resolved to send it in an original manner. He bought in the Rue Richelieu, in one of the large establishments in the neighborhood of the Bourse, a superb lot of lace. Whether Point d'Alençon, d'Angleterre, or Malines, is of little consequence; sufficient that it was twenty metres in extent, and cost three thousand four hundred francs!

One evening the bouquet, swathed in the precious tissue, parted from a loge, and fell at the feet of the sylphide. Madame found the flowers charming, and exultingly placed them in a Bohemian vase, first extracting their costly envelope. The lace was submitted to the verdict of a neighbor, who passed it to a young clerk familiar with silks, gimps, and embroidery; and, as chance would have it, it happened that he was precisely the person of whom the purchase had been made. He recognized the goods, and immediately revealed the prodigalities of his customer by indicating the price of the merchandise.

Informed of these details, an idea traversed the brain of the rival of Taglioni and Elssler. Disdaining all trophies of victory, indifferent to the homage of enthusiasm, she resold to the clerk the souvenir of an evening's success, at a loss of thirty per cent. on the original cost! And now the twenty metres of lace tranquilly sleep in the merchant's paste-board, waiting until a new bouquet or a ball-dress shall awaken them!

At the principal restaurants of Paris is sold choice and rare Bordeaux wine "returned from India." At the negotiant's, in the Rue Richelieu, they have invented "lace returned from Madame X——!"

PRUSSIA.

INAUGURATION OF THE REGENCY.

At one o'clock on Tuesday the members of both Chambers assembled in the White Saloon of the Royal Palace. The Prince Regent, after having thanked them for the patriotic unanimity with which they had co-operated in the establishment of the Regency, took, with a firm voice, the constitutional oath. The President of the First Chamber thanked his Royal Highness in the name of the country, and the President of the Second Chamber gave three cheers for the King and Prince Regent. The Minister President (Von Manteuffel) then declared the Diet closed.

The municipal authorities of Berlin have presented the following address to the Prince Regent: "Illustrious Prince Regent,—The whole country, and with it the principal place of residence of our sovereigns, represented by us, feel profoundly and sincerely the bitter sorrow of knowing our King and beloved master is still suffering. But we bless our Celestial Father for not having, in His bounty and goodness, left the country an orphan, and having given it in your Royal Highness, in this time of trial and affliction, the Royal master from whom the country expects the benefits of a just, mild, prudent, and strong government, such as it has always had for four hundred years, and such as is required by its welfare, liberty, and high mission. We pray the King of kings to accompany your Royal Highness with His blessing in the frequently thorny path of government, and to protect you with His powerful arm against all danger. May your Royal Highness deign to receive this expression of profound respect, love, and fidelity!"

The Prince replied: "I sincerely thank the authorities and delegates of the town of Berlin for their address on the occasion of my accession to the Regency of the kingdom. The more the cause of this temporary institution of a Regency is sad and sorrowful for our dear country the more painful to my heart is the duty which falls on me. But precisely because a duty is imposed on me, God, whose impenetrable decrees have charged me with it, will give me the force to accomplish it. On this point our sentiments are the same; and we incessantly address to Heaven our united prayers that our King and master, completely cured, may soon resume his august Royal functions."

ROBBERY OF A QUEEN.

On her recent passage through Leipsic—on the 13th ultimo—the Queen of Prussia was robbed of a box containing one five-hundred-thaler bill, several one-hundred-thaler bills, a number of gold coins, some articles of virtu, and, as a German paper significantly remarks, "last, not least," some manuscripts—possibly important state papers—in the Queen's handwriting. The Berlin Zeit estimates the value of the articles stolen at one thousand Fredericks d'or. The police have not the faintest clew to the perpetrator.

ITALY.

THE ACCIDENT TO THE POPE.

A correspondent of the Continental Review writes: "Possibly you may remember an accident which happened to the Pope in a building contiguous to the church. The floor of the upper portion, overweighted by prelates and other holy men, gave way, and the assembly found themselves on the ground-floor without having gone down stairs. None of them were hurt, and the credit of this lucky escape was naturally given to the Virgin and St. Peter. In order to reward his friends in need, the Pope had the interior of the church 'restored;' that is to say, the walls have been covered with loud-toned paintings and plaster of Paris medallions. One of the paintings is devoted to a faithful representation of the miracle, and displays the falling down of the room—the Virgin seated on a cloud, and St. Agnes, kneeling on another cloud, imploring her aid for his Holiness. Another painting shows the consummation of the miracle—the scene in the lower room. The Pope is standing upright, supported by St. Peter, and prelates are either falling or lying on the floor."

THE ABDUCTION OF THE JEW BOY.

The abduction of the Jewish boy is still the great subject of interest. The Siècle says: "The name of the medical attendant of the Mortara family at Bologna is Saragoni. In his certificate, dated 31st July, 1858, he declares that it was at the age of one year that the little Mortara was ill of a worm fever, which, however, caused no fear for his life. 'Professor Daveri and myself,' he says, 'felt perfect confidence on that point, and we informed the father, mother, and relatives of the child, and the servants of the family, of the fact of no danger existing.' It was, then, at the age of one year and not six that the little Mortara must have been baptized—if he were baptized at all, which is extremely doubtful. The servant, Anne Morisi, who did not speak of the baptism which she pretends to have administered until after five years of absolute silence, was not quite sixteen at the time of the indisposition of the boy! What a minister to confer a sacrament with all the formalities necessary for rendering it valid!"

A letter from Turin of the 23d says: "Is the baptism of young Mortara really proved? The Holy Office, it is true, affirms that it is; and its decision forms the basis of the conduct of the Holy See. But on reflecting well it is not difficult to prove that the decision of the Holy Office is unfounded and iniquitous. It rests on nothing more than the simple declaration of a girl, sixteen years of age, who was of loose conduct, and without education. She says that not knowing how to administer baptism, she applied to a druggist named Lepori, who told her. But Lepori says that this statement is false. His assertion destroys that of the woman, and that suffices to overthrow the plausible argument on which the Holy Office relies to consider the administration of baptism as certain and proved. It is not, then, proved that the child has been baptized."

FEARFUL MURDER BY A PRIEST.

The Débats contains the following letter from Rome, dated the 23d: "We have a most painful incident to record. The day before yesterday a priest was brought into the prisons of the Holy Office, guilty of assassination, accompanied with circumstances which excite special horror and disgust. The crime was committed in the little village of San Giulianello, five or six miles from Velletri. The following is the version most accredited, and which, unfortunately, appears to be too true. A small sum of money had been stolen from the curé of the place. He denounced a man of the country; but in default of evidence the accused was released. Furious at being at once frustrated of his vengeance and robbed of his money, the priest resolved to procure for himself the revelations which he wanted; to do this he enticed into a lonely grotto the son of the man whom he suspected, a youth of fifteen or sixteen years of age. Having bound him by surprise, he commenced applying a sort of torture, by piercing him slightly with a knife. The boy remained firm, either knowing nothing or not wishing to say any thing. The sight of the blood further excited the miserable priest, and ultimately the boy succumbed under thirty-two wounds. When the body was discovered it became the duty of this very priest to inter it. Those who assisted at the ceremony thought they observed in him a strange emotion at the moment of pronouncing absolution over the coffin. The next day the brigadier of the Carabiniers having called upon him for the certificate of the registry of death, he seemed yet more troubled. The suspicions already excited were increased, and he was arrested."

THE POPE AND MISS DIX.

Miss Dix has lately visited the Pope. She gives Dr. Franks the following account of the interview:

"I visited the lunatic asylum, and my heart revolted at the sight. I did not see sick persons whom man should pity, unfortunates whom we should endeavor to cure; they were brutes in chains, the dens of which seemed never to have been cleaned. Several days after my visit to the lunatic asylum I was presented to his Holiness the Pope, who knew the object of my travels. The Pope asked me in the most friendly manner whether I had yet visited the asylum at Rome. I had the courage to answer, 'Yes, I am convinced that your Holiness has not yet paid it a visit.' Pio Nono quickly raised his head, and only bowed, with an expressive, attentive look. I understood him, and related to him, in a voice full of emotion, all the horrors and barbarism I had witnessed. I ventured, trembling within myself, upon a bold expression on the unchristian treatment of the unhappy beings. The respect-commanding man of Christendom listened with earnest attention, and said, briefly, after I had concluded, 'Come again in a week's time,' and I then left his presence. My anxiety was unutterably great. The Protestant, the stranger, had perhaps risked too much. Although I was conscious in my heart of my good intentions, I yet passed a sleepless night, and a day of deep inward agitation. It created a sensation when the holy father, two days after I had been presented to him, suddenly, while taking one of his drives, stopped before the gate of the asylum, and spent an hour in it. The week had passed, and I stood, as I had been commanded, in the Vatican before the Pope. In a manner as grave as it was calm, Pio Nono said to me: 'I have appointed a commission, charged to lay before me propositions concerning the erection of a lunatic asylum, conformably to the rules of humanity and morality, in the shortest time possible. When you visit Rome again your just and pious wishes will have been fulfilled. I thank you for your communications. May Heaven bless you!' I bent my knee, deeply moved, not before the head of Catholic Christendom, but before the wise prince and the good man."

SPAIN.

WHETHER AN ORPHAN IS LIABLE FOR THE SINS OF ITS PARENTS?

A Spanish peasant, named Santos, was some time ago taken in the conscription, but he petitioned against being compelled to serve, on the ground of his having to maintain an orphan sister, a minor, which, according to the law in Spain, is a sufficient cause for exemption. It was, however, proved to the Tribunal of Segovia, before which the case was brought, that the said sister was not born in lawful wedlock, but some years after the widowhood of the mother, and consequently the exemption was not allowed. The man appealed to the Council of State in Madrid, and the council has just declared that female orphans can not be punished for a fault they did not commit, nor be deprived of the support of their brothers, and that consequently Santos shall be exempted from military service in order to support his sister.

PORTUGAL.

SETTLEMENT OF THE DISPUTE WITH FRANCE.

The Moniteur publishes the following: "The Minister of Foreign Affairs has received this morning a telegraphic dispatch, under date the 23d of October, from the Minister of the Emperor at Lisbon, announcing that the Portuguese Government had decided on restoring the ship Charles Georges, and setting at liberty Captain Rouxel."

A telegram from Lisbon, dated Monday, says: "This morning, at seven o'clock, the ship Charles Georges was restored, and the captain, Rouxel, set at liberty. The exact amount of indemnity that Portugal has engaged to pay, on the requisition of the French Government, is not yet fixed."

TURKEY.

THE WABASH ASTONISHING THE TURKS.

The Constantinople correspondent of the London Times, writing on the 16th October, says:

"The fine American frigate Wabash, the arrival of which I noticed in my last, has caused no small excitement at the Porte, as well as among diplomatists. It seems no one was aware of the size of the vessel, and, according to the wording of the application which was made at the Porte for her passage through the Dardanelles, a vessel of small size was expected. Of course size is a relative idea, and probably what is large at Stamboul may look small in New York. As America is not a party to the treaty which fixes twenty-one guns as the limit of the size of any man-of-war allowed to pass the Dardanelles, I don't know whose idea of large and small will ultimately prevail. In the mean time the frigate is the lioness of the Golden Horn, and, unless the diplomatists resolve to sink her under the weight of their dispatches, I am afraid it will be rather difficult to move her out of the comfortable position which she occupies, in the teeth of treaties and embassadors."

A Constantinople telegram of the 16th says:

"The United States Legation obtained a firman to admit only a corvette. On the appearance of the Wabash, the Porte drew up a protest, a copy of which was sent to the embassadors of the great Powers, and the American ship prepared to withdraw."

RUSSIA.

THE SHIP-RAISING AT SEBASTOPOL.

The following is an extract from a letter from Mr. Gowan:

"I have raised whole the 16-gun schooner Smelia, the steamers Turk and Groznoi, and also the 16-gun brig Aenas, the Parassiane, and Strella, and am now engaged on the steamers Danube and Odessa, which will be raised in a few days. In addition to the above, I have entirely removed the hulls of two old line-of-battle ships and a frigate, that were formerly used as prison-ships; also the frigate Havanna, and the line-of-battle ship Sagodul, with the exception of her keel, which is buried in over twelve feet of soft mud. My forces are now engaged in the removal of the 120-gun ship Constantine, line-of-battle ship Paris, and transport Benezau, which are ships in the middle of the harbor, and are rapidly being removed. The tornado has not injured the sunken ships to the extent generally supposed. The Russian Government are now repairing the steamer Turk, which is in excellent order; her hull is quite sound, with the exception of her upper works; her engines require some slight repairs; the commission that examined her decided that it would require but five per cent. of her value to restore her to complete running order. The other vessels are in equally as good a condition. I beg further to remark, that I contracted to clear the harbor of Sebastopol, and shall complete the work in a faithful manner. The various contradictory statements that have appeared have undoubtedly arisen from the fact that an American company came here with a wonderful pump (Gwynne's), by which means they supposed they could exhaust the water from the ships and float them. After ineffectual attempts for some six months, they abandoned their work, and departed for America, via Constantinople. Not wishing to depreciate the power of their machinery, they reported the impossibility of the ships ever being removed, which has now been practically refuted.

"I am, etc., John E. Gowan."

PERSIA.

AN EXPENSIVE PRIME MINISTER.

A letter from Teheran of the 15th September says:

"The examination made into the accounts of Mirza-Agha-Khan, ex-Sadragan (Prime Minister), who, with his two sons, is still in custody, has revealed facts which are almost incredible. Thus, though his salary was not less than 1,000,000 francs a year, he appropriated annually 6,000,000 francs; and during the war with England he levied on all the country a tax, which he called 'Tax for the Holy War,' which amounted to 12,000,000 francs; but of that sum only one fourth went into the treasury, the three others not having been accounted for by him and his creatures. It is alleged that one or two influential parties have strongly solicited the Shah to take this individual into his service again, and on his refusal have even employed threats. But the Shah has remained firm."

THE LAY OF THE CABLE.

TELLING OF ITS INLAYS AND OUTLAYS, ITS RELAYS AND DELAYS.

I.

This is the great electric wire;
Could the mind of humanity ever aspire
To any thing lower, or any thing higher,
Than a submarine, telegraph cable?

II.

Here is the poor man who first projected,
What richer and greater ones quite rejected,
But sharper ones seized, and at last perfected,
The famous Atlantic cable.

III.

This is the steamer, so strong and stout,
That carried the wonderful cable out,
And made such a puffing and smoke about
The famous Atlantic cable.

IV.

This is the wild and raging sea,
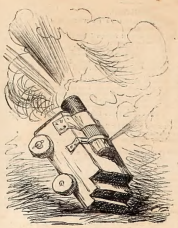
That leaped and roared so angrily,
And seemed exceedingly cross to be
At sight of the ocean cable.



V.

This is the fierce and terrible whale,
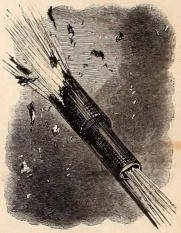
That spouted torrents and thrashed his tail,
Conspiring with every adverse gale
To destroy the ocean cable.



VI.

This is the iceberg, towering high,
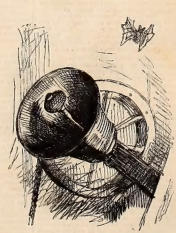
Whose top disappeared in the misty sky,
Approaching its jagged sides so nigh
As to threaten the ocean cable.



VII.

This is the cannon that roared and blazed,
At which the dull codfish were greatly amazed,
And the hopes of the sharks were exceedingly raised,
As it told the success of the cable.

VIII.

This is the rocket that soared so high,
Announcing to neighbors remote in the sky
That time and space were as things gone by,
Since the great event of the cable.

IX.

This is the bell whose brazen tongue,
In token of triumph, so madly rung,
Proclaiming aloud, as it swayed and swung,
The success of the ocean cable.

X.

This is the drum, so loud and deep,
That waked all the citizens out of their sleep,
To tell them the news, which it seems wouldn't keep:
The success of the ocean cable.

XIII.

This is the splendid triumphal car
In which stood the hero distinguished afar,
Like a victor returned from a glorious war,
Having put down the mighty cable.

XVI.

Here's poor little Justice, who tumbled flat
From the airy position in which she sat,
Feeling sure she had little to do with that Affair of the ocean cable.

XI.

This is the man who gave the oration,
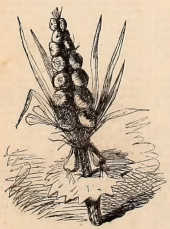
And scattered such compliments over the nation,
And talked of the Union and civilization,
On the text of the ocean cable.



XIV.

This is the elegant piece of plate
Presented to one who had honored the State
By the watery glories acquired of late
In the cause of the ocean cable.

XVII.

This is the ravenous crocodile,
Who came to these banks, from the banks of the Nile,
On a fishing excursion, exploring a while,
And snapped off the ocean cable.

XII.

These are the graceful bouquets presented,
So tastefully made and so charmingly scented,
So appropriate to those who were thus complimented
On account of the ocean cable.

XV.

This is the grand illumination,
Got up as a suitable demonstration
(Regardless of cost) by this liberal nation
On account of the ocean cable.

XVIII.

This is the figure now cut by the nation
On account of that wonderful celebration;
"Sic transit"—you know the quotation—
And the end of the mighty cable

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER VI.

Gentleman Walls does not forget old friend. The old friend remembers Archipelago in Pyrdenee, and is under the influence of Bacchus. Mr. Hartopp has at last a Gentleman Waiter.

WAITER fell on the floor of his threshold, exclaiming, sobbing, moaning, as voice itself gradually died away. The dog, who had been shut out from the house, and remained ears erect, head drooping, close at the door, rushed in at Jasper Leech. The two followers of the open easement now stole round; there was the dog, its paws on the old man's shoulder, trying to attract his notice, and whining for it.

Tenderly—reverentially, they lift the poor martyr—some ecstasy in the act—some pain, stain, from question; the dishonoring brand transmuted into the hallowing cross? And when the old man, after the usual inquiry-restorationics, his head was pillowed on the breast of the speaker, noble subscriber to the Benevolent Ireland, with instinctive deference for repute and respect for law, was kneeling by his side, clasping his hand, and as Waite glanced down, confusedly wondering, Hartopp exclaimed, half sobbing, "Forgive me, you said I should repent if I knew all! I do repent! I do! Forgive me—I shall never forgive myself!"

"Have I been dreaming? What is all this? You here, too, Mr. Carew? Oh, yes—yes! there was ASSYRIA. Gone! all—gone—gone! lost, lost! Ha! did you overhear me?"

"We overheard you without that window! See, spite of yourself, Heaven lets your innocence be known, and in bad hands—unconscious of your self-sacrifice."

"Fools! you will never betray me, either of you—never!" A father turn against his son!—horrible!"

Again he seemed on the point of swooning. In a few moments more his mind began evidently to wander somewhat; and as he muttered, with broken, unintelligible, half wandered words over the whole town in search of the pedlar, and told that he had been sent out on by-street, stopped and accosted by a tall man in a rough great-coat, and then hurrying off, he found he the strangers' address, to report his ill success. Hartopp and George had led Waite up stairs into his sleeping-room, laid him down on his bed, and were standing beside him watching his troubled face, and whispering to each other in alarm.

Waite overheard Hartopp proposing to go in search of some medical assistance, and answered piteously, "No, that would scare me to death. No doctors—no saves-druggers. I know it myself—quiet and kindness! I shall be well to-morrow."

George drew the curtains round the bed, and Waite caught him by the arm. "You will not let out what you heard, I know; you would stand how I love him, now care for son's judgments; but how dreadful it would be to make all I have done—I do to witness against my Lizzy's child! I—I! I trust you—dear, dear Mr. Morley; make Mr. Hartopp swear to it. If he would not drive me mad, not a syllable of what he heard must go forth—'twould be base in him."

"Nay" said Hartopp, whispering also through the curtains; "I don't see that I shall be called on, though 'tis very hard not to tell Williams, at least, that you did not take me in. But you shall be obeyed."

They drew away Merle, who was wondering what the whispered talk was about, and not a word or two more and there, and left the old man not quite to solitude—Waite's hand, in quitting George's grasp, dropped on the bed's head.

Hartopp went back to his daughter's home in a state of great excitement, drinking more wine than usual at dinner, talking more magisterially than he had ever been known to do, and in consequence misunderstanding against the world; observing that Williams had been unpardonably overbearing, and should be pensioned off: in short, casting the whole family into the greatest perplexity to guess what had occurred to the build man. Merle found himself a lodging, and rent a house, and came in to what were supposed to Waite and himself for the next three months, and found all the appears so perversely contradictory, that he ceased to trouble his head on the future then he was before the scheme was cast. George Morley remained in London, and kept up, from time to time, to Waite's room, but not fatiguing him with talk. Before midnight the old man slept, but his slumbers were much perturbed, as if by fearful dreams. However, he rose early, was better, but free from fever, and in full possession of his reason. To George's delight, Waite's first words to him then were expressive of a wish to return to Surrey. He had dreamed," he said, "that he had heard her voice calling out to him to come to her in pain. He would not revert to the scene with Jasper. George once ventured to touch on that reminiscence, but the old man's look became so imploring that he desisted. Nevertheless, it was evident to George that Waite's desire of return was induced by his belief that he had become necessary to Sophy's protection. Jasper, whose memory would probably be very short-lived, had clearly discovered Sophy's residence, and as clearly Waite, and Waite alone, still retained some hold over his ragged beast. Perhaps, too, the old man had no longer the same dread of encountering Jasper, rather, perhaps, a faint hope that, in another meeting, he might more availingly soften his son's heart. He was not only willing, then—he was eager to depart, and either regained or assumed much of his old cheerfulness in setting with his hostess, and taking leave of her and her children, but later parting with Merle, on whom he forced his latest savings, and with the contents of his panier. Then he took aside George, and whispered in his ear, "A very sweet, kind-hearted man, Sir; can you deliver him from the Planets?—they bring him ruin and trouble. If there no opening for a cobbler at Humberston?"

George nodded, and went back to Merle, who was saying his errands with his customary "My good friend," and the scholar, "Do me two favours besides all the favours of which I am already honored in conducting me back to a revered friend. First, let me buy of you the contents of that basket. I love old-world curiosities. I would divide them as heir-looms; next, as we were travelling in the same direction for some younger days, are you look to a craftwhich does not seem to have prospered, you were brought up to country occupations, and can well leave the sheep, their cure and their maladies. Well, I have a few acres of arable land in my own hands, not enough for a bailiff—too much for my gardener—and a pretty cottage, which once belonged to a shepherd. Come, I will trust him a horse-one; it is now vacant, and at your own charge, and take it off my hands, and my stock off my hands; we shall not quarrel about the salary. But, hark-ye, my friend—on one promise—give me the basket. Don't leave the Stars to mind their own business."

"There you have me!" said Merle, who, at the earlier part of the address, had evinced the most grateful emotion, but who, at the proviso which closed it, looked very much puzzled and displeased. "Please your Reverence, not to think I'm not as much grateful to you as your his Significator at Birth for a mess of portrich! There was that fortin chap, Gully-Lee—he stuck to the stars, as you may see by his almanacks—and the stars stuck by him, and brought him up to Parliament, and down to Queer Street and again hin. He had Maleties in his Ninth House, which belongs to Parsons."

"Contrary, I hope," interpolated, dear Mr. George?" said Waite, persuasively. "Suppose Merle persevere in his system of casting astrological schemes to himself, or at least only talk of them to you; they can't hurt you, I should think, Sir? I would not like to see you lose Merle; and the Chaldees, who were the great astrologers, were regarded as sages, and not as fools. Merle, George, who is the great scholar, will convince you of that."

"Contrary, I hope," said George, as Mr. Merle will leave my children and servants, and his parish generally, in happy ignorance of the future, I give him the fullest leave to discuss his sciences with myself whenever we can together on matters of which I am wholly ignorant, and perhaps I may—"

"Be convinced!" said Waite, with a twinkling gleam of the playful Humor which had ever greeted along his thorny way by the side of Sorrow.

"I did not mean that," said the Parson, smiling; "I mean the contrary. Merle! Merle? Is it not a bargain?"

"Sir—God bless you!" cried Merle, simply; "I see you mean it, and that is my own flight. And what Gentleman Waite says as to the value, is my contrairy opinion."

This matter settled, and Merle's future secured in a way that his stars, on his reverse of fate, never bargained to find, George and Waite walked on to the station, Merle following with the basket, and the friendly Parson Sir Isaac charged with Waite's bundle. They had not gone many yards before they met Jasper Leech coming out of the inn in Prospect Row. He was vexed at learning Waite was about to leave so early; he had set his heart on coaxing him to return to Gatesboro' with himself—astounding Williams and Mr. Hartopp—enchanting the whole town at High Street, that, in deeming Mr. Chapman a good and a great man indeed. His own fault he thought, he had not been taken in. He consoled himself at first for Waite's refusal of this kind invitation and unexpected departure by making proudly the side him to the station, finding it thronged with townspeople come to see the departure of Onezford—in whose presence he kept bowing his head to Waite with every word he uttered, and, calling down to the station to arrange for his own name and importance—he told him confidentially that the game then I had the elderly gentleman, and see that he and his companion had a carriage to themselves all the way, and that Sir Isaac had a comfortable good portable box. "A very great man," he said, with his face up, "only he will not let me have it known—just at present." The guard stares, and promises all deference—opens the door of a carriage, and Jasper sees—sees—sees Waite that he and his friend shall not be disturbed by other passengers. The train begins into movement—Hartopp runs on by its side along the stand—his hat off—kissing his hand; Waite, with a grave inclination under the dark hood, and is lost to sight, he turns back, and seeing Merle, says to him, "You know that gentleman—the old one?"

"Yes, a many year."

"Have heard any thing against him?"

"Yes, once—at Gatesboro'."

"I envy you," said Hartopp; and he went off with a sigh.

CHAPTER VII.

Jasper Leech in his Element. O young Reader, whosoever thou art, on whom Nature had bestowed her magnificent gift of physical power with the joys it commands, remember that perhaps there is no more closing this chapter, pause a moment and think—What will thou do with it?—Shall it be heroic—or God-like? With what advantage for life—to delight or its perils—feels horse with ease, and glories along beneath thee when thou art full of it, and even thy clown's Mind that exercises the Heroic, and what it is to be conscious of power, and to be able to say to thyself, and feel that strength is not only formed to thy shame and the torture. The Wealth of the life will be to thy Misery. Thou wilt not feel it, will gotten the use of Sense. Will help give and forget—take. Then hast none. Will teach taught—and give it!

JASPER LEECH, on quitting his father, spent his last coins in payment for his horse's food, and on fiery drink for himself. In haste he mounted—in haste he rode on to London, not even pence for the toll-bars. Where he found the gate open, he dashed through them heedlessly, where closed, as the night advanced, he forced his horse across the fields, over hedge and ditch—sometimes once the animal falling with him—more than once thrown from the saddle; yet, on he rode, in spite of all, and arrived stretched Cutts' lodging. Cutts was, however, in the club-room of those dark associates against whom Lucky had been warned. Oblivious of his solemn promise to Arabella, Jasper entered the revelers to be stinted into the room, and toward the chair of honor at the far end of it, on which he had been accustomed to lord it over all his groups he had pressed out of Pooles purse. One of the biggest and most dejected of the gang, he had been placed at the point of dignity, and, refusing sadly to yield it at Jasper's rude summons, was seized by the scruff of the neck and literally hauled on the table in front, coming down with clutter and much temper and clamor. Jasper seated himself coolly, while the hubbub began to swell—and reared for drink. An old man, who served as one of those cavaliers, went out to obey the order; and when he was gone, those near the door heard him call out to some one, "Here's a gentleman!"

The confounding of the innumerable uproar gathering, and waited but the moment to explode. Jasper, standing on his bloodshot eyes, saw Cutts within a few chairs of him, seeking to conceal himself as much as

"Cutts, come hither?" cried he, imperiously. Cutts did not stir.

"Throw that cur this way—you who sit next him."

"Don't, don't; his mad fit is on him; he will murder me—murder me, who have helped and saved you all so often. Stand by me!"

"We will, by God!" cried Williams, the one groping for his case-knife, the other for his weiver.

"Do you fear I should lop your ears, dog!" cried Jasper, "for shrinking from my side with your tail between your legs. Push! I scorn to waste force on a thing so small. After all, I am glad you left me; I shall enjoy more the full find your baseness at an inn in the village of —. I will pay for its hire whenever we meet again. Meanwhile, I had another matter—I'll charge you. Mille tonnerres! why does that wretched table-cloth cover the bench? the rock of tobacco smoke; saw the man he had dislodged, and who, never mastered from amazement by his fall, had kept silence on rising, and was now ominously interchanging muttered words with those who sat near him, were also on their legs. Jasper turned from him contemptuously, with some contempt in his tone, fierce since, noted the lowering frowns on either side the Pandemonium; and it was only with an angry flash in his eyes that he mastered, on closing his survey, the bar dropped across the door, and two forms, knife in hand, stationed at the threshold.

"Abs! my jolly companions," said he, then, "you do right to bolt the door. Prudent families can't settle their quarrels too snugly among themselves. Come here one or persons to give you all a proper scolding; and if some of you don't hang your heads for shame before I have done, you'll be a pretty game than I think, for whenever you come to the Bar?"

He rose as he spoke, and brushing his sinewy arms across his wide chest. Most of the men had risen too—some, however, remained seated. Those who had risen looked more than all. Every eye was fixed on him, and many a hand was on a clasp-knife.

"Come of the earth!" burst forth Jasper, with voice like a roll of thunder, "I stooped to come among you, and you repay me by mutiny. Was any one of you too poor to pay up his club fees by a shrewdish of Forgetfulness? said, 'Brother, take!' Did brawl break out by your jollities—were knives drawn—a threat in dagger—pistol in hand crack down my sacred, crushed back the coward murder. If I did not pity your rapacities, it was because they were sneaking and pitiful. I came as your Patron, not as your Pal; I did not meddle with your secrets—I did not touch your plunder. I owed you nothing. Offal that you are! to me you owed deference, meat, and considerability. I gave you mirth, and I gave you Law; and in return ye laid a plot among you to get rid of me—how, ye white-livered scoundrels? Ode not by those lists, and knives, and bludgeons. All your pigeon breasts clubbed together had not manhood for that. But to pain off upon me some dastardly deed of your own, by snares and scraps of false evidence—false oaths, no doubt—to smuggle me off to the hangman. That was your precious contrivance. One again I am here; but this once only. What for Cowards, to laugh at, and spit at, and spurn you. And if one man among you has in him the spirit of a man, let him step forward now as traitors who planned that pitiful project, and be then a dozen, they shall curry the mark of this hand till their cowardly flesh be like shredded steak!"

He ceased. Though each was now hustling the other toward him, and the whole pack of miscreants was closing up, like hounds round a wounded stag, the only one who found a mollitongue was that thin splinter of life called Cutts!

"Look you, General Jas, it was all a mistake your ever coming here. You were a fine fellow—very particularly in the matter of doing business—large prizes and lots of rose. That don't suit us; we are quiet Englishmen. You brag of beating and bullying the gentlemen who admit you among them, and of not liking the Bar—Bar or rule; I say that one thing is quite out of order—to proceeded for it. How do we know, you see, that you will not, could not be made one, since you say you owe us nothing, and hold us in such scorn? Truth is truth, and facts of you. You say you will come this once: very well, you have spun your yarn—now! That's all we want; you're free, and never trouble us again. Gentlemen, I move that General Jas be expelled this club, and ex-pelled from Humberston."

"I second it," said the man whom Jasper had flung out of the room.

"Those who are in favor of the resolution hold up their hands; all—carried unanimously. Gentlemen, he is expelled."

"Expel me!" said Jasper, who, in the mean while, regained his self-control, "Expel me! I've cleared the space round him, and stood resting his hands on the heavy arm-chair from which he had risen.

A hostile and simultaneous movement of the group brought a roar or two of derision upon him. Up rose the chair on which Jasper had leaned—up it rose in his right hand, and two of the assailants fell as if hit as with a thunderbolt's blow. With his left hand he wrenched a knife from the hold of the fourth, and then armed with blade and buckler, he sprang on the table, towering over all. Before him was the man with the sword-cane, a gentleman from the rest—ticket-of-leave man, who had been transported for forgery. He had already fairly whipped this knave to Cutts. Cutts drew back the hesitating arm. "No; the noise! bludgeon sticks!" Beware, as Cutts drew, Jasper passes as a hawk on its quarry, darted Jasper's sword on the former's and the next instant, flinging the chair in the faces of those who were now swarming up the table, Jasper had seized with the revolver, and by his left clutched from its startled owner, and its six barrels threatened death, right and left, beside and before and around him, as he turned from face to face. Instantly there fell a hush—instantly the assailants drew back, and for that time the sheltering would make the hand tremble or the ball reserve. Whoever Jasper looked in the face, he coiled. He laughed with audacious mockery as he surveyed the screamers.

"Now, you, your rear, each of you—down that knife, down that bludgeon! That's well. Down revolver! Down sword-cane! Down fists—down! Pile them here on the table at my feet. Dogs, what do you fear?—death? The first who moves dies!"

Mute and servile as a repentant Legion to a Caesar's order the knives piled their summit.

"Umber dear, poor you two. You, orator Cutts, go in front; light a candle; open the door, Cutts. Now, then, you, Sir, you, who was with a parting cup—to your healths? Thank you, Sir. Here, you, Cutts, hand me down from the wall—each of you. Line my way. He, ho!—you harm me—you daunt me—you—you! Ha, ha! Gentlemen, farewell! Cutts, your rear, and cheer. 'That this meeting records the retraction for the reproaches of General Jasper and entreats him humbly to remain, the pride and ornament of the club?' Those who are for this motion will signify by their hats and cheers as one against it, theirs. Carried unanimously. Gentlemen, I thank you for your kind vote to give but I'll see you hanged first; and till that sight directs me—gentlemen, your health!"

Descending the room has ceased, he passed slowly down the room unscathed, unmenaced, and, with the knife in his hand, at the threshold strode along the passage to the street-door. There, seeing Cutts with the light in his hand, he unscrewed the pistol, locked the cape, and giving it to his quondam associate, said, "Hand that to Arabella, with my kind compliments. One word—speak truth, and fear nothing. Did you send help to Darrell?"

"I—I—I swear it."

"I am sorry for it. I should like to have heard so trusty a friend lifted over. Go back to your pals. Understand now why I scorned to work with such rotten tools."

Cutts, relieved of the pistol, locked the outer door, and followed Jasper, who, on quitting the house, had turned to itself if he had more solid brains and less liquid fire in them.

CHAPTER VIII.

Jasper Leech's descent under the influence from which Paterhead was borne by Black Harper. He forgets a promise, renounces a scheme, yields a river side; and a door thence on the Rising Sun and the Grim Woman.

JASPER had satisfied the wild yearnings of his wounded vanity. He had vindicated his claim to hardihood and address, which it seemed to him he had forfeited in his interview with Dora Bell. With cruel creet and a positive sense of elation, of animal joy that predominated over hunger, fatigue, remorse, he strided on—he knew not whither. He would not go back to his former lodgings; they were probably known to the set which he had just flung from him, with a vague resolve to abjure henceforth all acquaintance, and trust to himself alone. The hour was now late—the streets deserted—but he might not be at rest so long as he could himself to the loathed dictation of Arabella Crane? Well, his woe preferred even that to bombling himself to Darrell, after what had passed. Darrell's parting words had certainly implied that he would not be a welcome or a treaty as he had shown himself to threats. But Jasper was in no humor to entreat. Mechanically he resolved to stride on toward the solitary district in which Arabella held her home; but by the time he was so far advanced as to shrank from disturbing the grim woman at that hour—almost as respectfully afraid of her eyes and stern voice as the outlaw he had quitted were of his own crushing hand and leveled pistol. So, left to himself in one of the dim squares of Bloomsbury, he gathered himself up under the sheltering porch of a spacious mansion, unaware that it was the very house which Darrell had once occupied, and that from the parlor the Black Horse had borne away the mother of his wife. In a few minutes he was fast asleep—sleeping with such weary, dreamless soundness, that the policeman passing him on his beat, after one or two vain attempts to rouse him, was seized with a certain compunction, and suffered the weary outcast to slumber on.

When Jasper woke at last in the gray dawn, he felt a strange numbness on one side. It was even with difficulty that he could lift himself up. That sensation gradually wore away, and was followed by a quick tingling down the arms to the tips of the fingers. A gloomy noise rang in his ears, like the boom of funeral bells. Then the pavement seemed to be sliding from under him. Then he dreamily remembered that which he ascribed to cold and want of food, and rather agreeably surprised not to feel the grave of his accustomed pains, Jasper raised himself to Podden Place. The house was still inclosed. It was not till after the funeral that had been pretty often repeated, that the bolts were withdrawn from the door, and Bridgett Gregge appeared. "Oh, it is you," she said, she said, with much sullenness, but with no apparent surprise. "Mistress told me that I was to come while she was away; and I'm to get you the bedroom you had, over the stationer's, six years ago, if you like it. You are to have your meals here, and have the best of every thing; that's mistress's orders."

"Oh, Mrs. Crane is out of town," said Jasper, much relieved; "where has she gone?"

"I don't know."

"When will she be back?"

"In a few days; so she told me. Will you walk in and have breakfast? Mistress said there was to be always plenty in the house—you might come any moment. I'll scrape your feet."

Jasper heavily mounted into the drawing-room, and impatiently waited the substantial refreshments which were soon placed before him. The cocoa was doubtful, as if it had been left but the day before—the prim book-shelves—the empty keel-cases—the bunches of lavender easy-chair—the footstool—the sofa, which had been added to the original furniture for his express comfort, in the days when he was first adopted as a son—nay, on the hearth-rug the very slippers, on the back of the chair the very dressing-gown, graciously worn by him while yet the fairness of his form justified his fond respect for it.

For that day he was contented with the negative luxury of complete repose in all these, as in every attempt to move, he felt the same numbness of limb as that with which he had woke, accompanied by a kind of pricking light at the back of the head, and at the junction with the great seat of intelligence—the top of the spine with the great mainspring of force; and, withal, a reluctance to stir, and a more than usual inclination to doze. Before the next day, though these unpleasant sensations continued, his impatience of them and his haste of solitude made him anxious to go forth and seek some distraction. No distraction left to him but the gambling-table—no company except the low-victims in that sucking whirlpool. Well, he knew a few gaming-houses, and went out all night. Wishing to add somewhat to the miserable remains of the £1 borrowed on the horse, that made all his capital, he lost £5 more, got, indifferently, to oblige him with two or three sovereigns, if she had any to spare, he might borrow them in the neighborhood till her mistress returned. Bridgett answered, with illsimulated glee, that her mistress had left positive orders that Mr. Lorely was to have every thing he could for except—money; and then colored with wrath and shame; but he said no more—whistled—took his hat—went out—returned to the gaming-house—lost—lost still—ing, and returned moodily to dine in Podden Place. The austerity of the mansion, the loneliness of the evening, began now to inspire him with unmitigated disgust, which was added in fresh accession to his old scorn of mourning for the absent Arabella. The affront put upon him in the matter which Bridgett had so pointedly repeated, made him yet more distastefully contemplate the dire necessity of falling under the rigid despotism of this determined guardian: it was like going back to a preparatory school, to be indicted of pocket-money, and sit in a dark corner! But what other resource? None but appeal to Darrell—still more intolerable; except —he paused in his cogitation, shook his head, muttered "No, no." But that "except" would return! Except to forget his former pride, and his own promise—except to hunt out Sophy, and extract from the generosity, compassion, or fear of her protectress, some such conditions as would break from Darrell. Jasper felt that he doubt now that the girl was with Lady Montfort; he felt that, if she really loved Sophy, and knew his blighting her name in the world, whether of Matilda or of Darrell himself, he might much more easily work on the fears and nerves of a woman, shrinking from all noise and scandal, than he could on the stubborn pride of his resolute father-in-law. Perhaps it was on account of Sophy—perhaps to plead for her—that Lady Montfort had left town. Yes, that was perhaps the grief visible on that lady's countenance, as he caught so hasty a glimpse of it, might be occasioned by the illness of her child. If so, there might be now some breach or dissension between her and Darrell, which would render the Machiavelian still more accessible to his demands. As for his father—if Jasper played his cards well and boldly, he might yet secure the favor of his disobedience; he might coax or threaten Lady Montfort into the favor of the head of the present Lord, and, on learning it, proceeded at once to Richmond—on foot, and with no less small, scarcely perceptible economy, nolly contiguous to Lady Montfort's villa. Here he found two or three carriages standing before the river side; and entering into conversation with them about their craft, which was sufficiently familiar to him, he learned that the Montfort set out on that tide in the holidays of his youth, and proceeded to Jasper's boat, and looked over and unsuspectingly answered. "Yes, there was a young lady with Lady Montfort; they did not see me come. They saw me, but they left me on the lawn—seen her, too, at church. She was very pretty"—Jasper's heart bounded—"and one of his father he only heard that "there had been an old gentleman such as he described—lame, but with one eye—who had been observed creeping up in a cottage on Lady Montfort's grounds. They heard his dog bark at the boat, and the basket—they did not know if for sale; if so, perhaps for a charity. They supposed he was a pedestrian, for they had heard no sound or odition to the young lady. But Lady Montfort's own coachman, who had driven her down, could, no doubt, give him all the information he required. Jasper was too wary to call on the coachman. He had learned enough for his present end. Had he prosecuted his researches further, he might only have exposed himself unnecessarily and to the chance of his inquiries being repeated to Lady Montfort by one of her servants, and even setting her on the track of one who, if her father had cautioned her against him. It never occurred to him that the girl might not have told, have returned; and those to whom he confined his interrogatories were quite ignorant of that fact. Jasper had no doubt whatever, therefore, but that the only Lord Montfort. His self-love was much from presenting to him the idea of an outlook, and to whom he had been once presented on equal terms, as the bridegroom of her friend and the confidante of her own love affairs, as a gullishments that bespoke so utter a fall. Better, even in all extremities, to conciliate—cajole—the gentleman; more likely to excite pity for suffering—less likely to suggest excuse for rebutting the claims, and showing him to the door. Not indeed, so dressed, in that villainous pea-jacket, and with all other habiliments to match, would any servant admit him?—could he get into Lady Montfort's presence? He must go back—wait for Mrs. Crane's return. Yes, that was the course he had his wish—half a reform in itself—to cast off the outward shell of his present degradation.

Accordingly he went back to his London hotel better spirits, and so absorbed in his hopes, that he was not arrived at Podden Place to be aware that, from some obliquity of vision, or want of the accustomed habitual keenness of sight and muscle, his hand twice missed the knocker in sounding—first above, then below it; and when, at length, actually in the act of knocking, the solid iron: the sense of touch seemed suspended. Bridgett appeared. "Mistress is come back, and will see you."

Jasper did not look charmed; he winced, but screwed up his courage, and nodded his head—slowly—heavily. From the landing-place above glared the eyes of his uncle—the dead and almost quailed his bold spirit nearly six years before; and almost in the same words as then, a voice as exciting, but less stern, said,

"So you come at last to me, Jasper Lorely—you are come, Jasper Lorely—Jasper, the step noiseless as a specter's, Arabella Crane descended the stairs; but she did not, as when he was last under her roof, hang over the rails to hand or gaze into his face. Rather, it was with a shrinking avoidance of his touch—almost a thing like a shudder—that she glided by him into the open drawing-room, beckoning to him to follow. He faltered after her, but felt a hesitancy to retreat—to fly the house; his superstitious awe of the mysterious influence of her will more strongly than ever. But her help at the moment was necessary to his very hope to escape all future need or fear, and, though with a vague foreboding of unconjecturable evil, he stepped into the room, and the door closed on both.

A STORY WITHOUT A NAME.

It is many years since the events which called the accompanying papers into his transpired. Why they are now published by my own consent is one of those unexplainable points which occur in our lives, and which, when they are presented from a morbid desire to excite the sympathies of others to our own mental and physical distresses.

I am a poor man, with which fortune has drawn, both by my uncle, and by Mr. Withering, my uncle's attorney and friend, I employed it was his intention to publish them during his lifetime, but perhaps I lacked courage to do so. My uncle has now been dead some years, and I believe I am doing nothing but his will in giving them to the public.

I have just been looking in my glass. A compliment paid me by my housekeeper has awakened my attention to the fact that I am not growing old as fast as I might. Fifty-seven is the age which sets the marks of time should show, and yet my hair is not drawn with a single hair of gray, while my face has not those inevitable wrinkles which should follow fast upon forty. I am not smooth and fair, but I am not ashamed of myself, and will tell me I bear my age well, especially well, when it is considered that my life, or that part of it which is important to anyone, complied with several distress of no ordinary kind. I am again in the native place of my birth, after an absence of thirty years; I was absent by my own free will, but it is now no home to me. Time has wiped out every thing in the hearts I once knew, or has so blunted my memory that I recognize them no longer; where I once stood upon the footing of friend, I am a stranger, now spring rows and groups of marble palaces; the dirty streets of the business localities are given to the small, scattered habitations, which to overflowing with the wealth of the world. Do people live here as they did? Are there still friends who were my dear and particular friends but thirty years since, not one familiar face can I find in the throng which passes away a thousand in a day. I was once familiar comes to my ear or my eye. There was a favorite walk of mine, which, from a wealthy and successful lawyer, who thirty years ago swept my little seven-and-six-pence office in a day, has become the resting-place and sipping his wine in the club-room when I heard his name mentioned. I remembered him as a boy, for he was honest. An honest lawyer was what I wanted. I sought an introduction; but Mark never would have recognized in Lorely, Jr., Dudley Wells, of the Brazilian Army, his old master Lorely's boy. He is a rich man, and lives in Fifth Street. I sincerely enjoyed his astonishment when, after a short time, I announced myself under my own name.

Four years upon the coast of Africa, from Sierra Leone to the Cape, would, I flatter myself, ripen man's personal; to say nothing of five years' indiscriminate knocking about the world, and twenty in the army and navy of his Majesty the Emperor of the Brazils. I am told that I even speak my native tongue with a foreign accent. This may be; but I wished to find an honest lawyer, and I employed Mark Withington with this view. I am glad to say that my accounts, I must congratulate thirty years in my life.

The sole member of my family left to me on reaching my majority was my brother Alfred. By nearly seven years Alfred was my elder. By him, and him alone, was centred all the heart all the wealth of affection I would have bestowed on father and mother, sister and friend. Alfred married, I have received it, only those can tell who had loved as I. Save me I had Alfred was all to me. I did not for twenty years since first my memory served me so fay and was, we had never known a day—a single hour—a single circumstance asunder. We were as inseparable in thought and sympathy as we were in person. No two persons so alike. In our walks we were seen together, in our business one. It would have been folly for any of our partnership to have visited the same place without the other. Such a proceeding was unknown in our experience, and would have been altogether unjust and imperfidence. We were known under the sobriquet of the "Shadows;" and many an old citizen has still his old customary slip back in the street, when he sees himself few in New York but knew the two who, dressing alike, walking alike, and talking alike, were known to those who did not know their names by the above title. We both loved Carrie Mansfield. I have had a struggle with a long time how I should bring out this declaration. My story is untold without it, and yet the task is to me wringing memories from the dead, bringing back, in all their ghastly horror, that which time has buried, or buried by hundreds of fathoms on the grave.

Carrie Mansfield was an only child. Dark and fiery in her nature as she was in her person, scarce a day passed with my brother or myself that some fierce cause of quarrel did not arise, and flashing black eyes to flash forth their fires in anger, until, as often we could not tell which of the two began it when the storm was over, that we would never see Carrie Mansfield again, or peril our happiness on a probability that for what would appear to be a week. As often as this pledge was made so often was it broken, and the first grave words which fell from my brother, not that he loved her, but that he should love any one sufficiently to deceive me. I was not jealous of her, that she loved him better than me. If it were so I could have surrendered her without a word, but that she should have won my brother from me—that she should have been the cause of his first deceit, almost I hated Carrie Mansfield.

How I struggled with this discovery for months! —how I endeavored to believe that it was my heart bursting. I sought every little chance to win him back! How, with a burning passion, I still avoided Carrie Mansfield as much as her presence was death to me! And then when I saw, by his haggard face and sunken eye, that all this weary battle was breaking the life of my brother, I cast myself on my knees before him and plead to him, by the memory of our dead mother, by the sacredness of friendship, to tear away the bond that held him to this woman, and be once more my brother and my brother. He listened to me with a stolid look, and as I rose to throw myself in his arms he repulsed me with a push and a curse that astounded me. "And I?" From that day we never spoke to each other but in a cold, formal way. From that day it was my brother's intention to leave soon for Europe, there to spend the remainder of his life. I was to remain in New York to look after our joint maiden name. He came to the office, but only at such hours as I was known to be absent. We never met at the places to which we formerly went together. I avoided them—I avoided my brother. He had done me great wrong, and I never forgave it. It must be for him to bend, and then I would not remember that I was the one who had the first agony I had suffered from that wrong. So time went on; and it was announced to me that a certain day my brother and Carrie Mansfield would visit my brother to a foreign land, never to return. The acknowledgment that was to be made to me. It was the third day before the sailing of the ship, and my brother had made no offer of reconciliation.

I had been to the office that day, and, as I had been any my absences would not have been again noticed, I left it at an early hour, and, as I had to wish to speak to me, or would he prefer that we should part in this unnatural manner? What should I say to my brother? What did I do?

I had finished business for the day—such business as I had to do—and my aide, Jones, came in after me, to execute—and was passing slowly up toward Broadway, when I saw my brother coming down. He was accompanied by no one except the street, as I could plainly see, to avoid me. He was going to the office. I would therefore not go to him. I would not part with my brother so. I watched him on to recrossed the street and passed into the building; and then I turned and walked up and back to the door. I stopped a moment. I knew that I was about to do a cowardly action—that I might collect myself and think what I should say to my brother, and how I should endeavor hurriedly away. I entered. And then with confidence I went up stairs. I had my hand at the speaking-tube, when I heard voices within in altercation; my brother's, and—great Heaven! could it be?—Carrie Mansfield's. I did not wish to listen, but I was transfixed. I heard him say,

"You are a fiend!"

"And if I am, who made me so but yourself? You have trifled with me on the web of deceit and you are my master."

"If I have been your master, I am so no longer. I am free from you, and you shall never have you the liberty which you have so long wished. Go—you make me evil."

"You shall not leave me! I will follow you over the earth."

"You shall not!" And he laughed and, as I could plainly hear, struck his clenched fist upon the table.

And then I could hear her speak again. This time it was in a pleading voice.

"Alfred, I implore you—I implore you do. I am wrong—I am wrong—but I love you; let that love plead my excuse. Think what sacrifices I have made for you; and do not leave me."

Sacrificed! What did she mean? How my heart throbbed! What did she mean? Was I the wretched threshold? Why did I stay?

My brother's voice was low, but I lost none. He words I did not hear at first. When I could distinguish, he said,

"I am unchangeable, Carrie; let it be final. I will not destroy your peace and mine forever. All the love I possessed between us is buried under our own bosoms; so let it remain. I shall seek new life in a distant land—you, one who can make you happy. Let us part in peace."

There was a deathly stillness for a few moments and I wished that I could go to them, but I had no desire. I had no power to go further; and I has a stolid shriek, and the single word, "Wretch!" escaped my lips. I do not know that I spoke it, but for my hand had reached the knob my brief sound it quickly. He said, hoarsely, as he pulled me,

"Take care of her."

I turned and left the room. Miss Mansfield upon the floor. It was only the work of a minute to raise her head on my arm. Fortunately, I had not far exposed—soon brought assistance. A rings was procured; and I carried her in my arms and placed her in a coach. Then I left her at her home she partially recovered, and I could directly hear her say,

"He did not strike me; it was my own hand."

I was glad—yes, I was glad that my brother had not so forgotten himself as to strike her. I let her go. Literally, I let her go. Literally, I literally drove hurriedly away. That evening, and next day, and the next, I sent to know how Miss Mansfield was. The answer was,

And now came the day that my brother sailed. And I went early to the office. I would believe but that Alfred would at the last moment to me, or extend some invitation for me to go home. I sent away the boy that we might be when we were; I choked down my fears, burned with a agony of fever; I paced the Nine, ten, eleven o'clock passed; the ship sail resolved. Yes, from the first of that very day my brother I shall never forget the agony the death of that hour?

Twelve! and the boom of the gun from t parting ship came to my ear with the clang of the bells that announced the hour. O God! my brother. Then I would have flown to him through every obstacle; then it was too late. My head fell upon my desk in deathly sickness, and a gush of tears for hours told me more than I had known till that time. I went into the street as one who had lost all. Had a pestilence struck the city it could not have seemed to me more deserted. I hurried to my home, though I had not seen my brother there for many days; yet the knowledge that he was under the same roof satisfied me—now he was there no longer.

As I entered the old housekeeper advanced to to me with a grave face. A letter! who from?

A letter from my brother. O Heaven! it was written at ten o'clock. The messenger had just returned, stating he could not find the office. It was well that he did not personally return it to me; I would certainly have killed him. It read:

"Brother, I am wrong. Come to me—come to the ship!—Forget all. ALFRED ———."

Thirty-five years have passed since that day, but the agony of it is on me yet. It was too late; no one knew where my brother had gone; I could not write; his destination after reaching London was unknown. I must only wait, and hope that time would reveal it.

Days passed; and I had partially calmed back into my business routine, when I one day received a note from Miss Mansfield. She wished to see me. I hesitated, but yielded. That evening I spent at her house—the first time I had been there for a year, save only when I gave her into the arms of her mother from the carriage. She cried bitterly at our meeting—they were true tears. She loved my brother; she confessed it with broken sobs. She knew she had lost him by her own violence and temper. It had taught her a bitter lesson; but it should be a well-heeded one. I thought my heart was dead to Carrie Mansfield, but before that evening had passed I knew I was wrong. I loved her still; but—she should never know it.

Months passed away. I had grown to be a recluse from all society. I could not go among my old friends without hearing them talk of my brother, and I hated to hear any one talk of him but Carrie. I went nowhere but to her house. I could not avoid it. Many and many a time had I felt the spell that was wound about me, and as often I persuaded myself of my ability to resist. At last the time came; and, one year after my brother's departure, I offered myself to Carrie Mansfield and was accepted. We were married.

I will draw a vail over the next five years of my life. It seems like one long dark dream. Thank God, we had no children born of our hate! That five years brought me from independence to poverty; from liberty to slavery; from honor to degradation. And then she left me. Left me in darkness and in disgrace, and went forth to live a life of shame and sin; to traffic in the beauty that commended her for the moment, but cursed her for time! I never saw her again. It was well it was so. But long years afterward, while upon the coast of Africa, I had letters from home, one of which, from undoubted authority, informed me that she had been stabbed in the street at New Orleans. Her murderer had never been discovered, but was supposed to have been one of the desperate men who had been her only society in that city. From my brother I have never heard since. Until my return to New York, where I hear he has been seen several times within the past ten years, so altered with poverty that he was only recognized by his name.

It was for this I wanted the services of Mark Withington. I must discover my brother, if he be on the face of this earth. I must be reconciled to him; and, if he be poor, I must share with him the wealth I have so easily gained.

My name is Mark Withington. I am an Attorney at Law. My office is at No. 18 Pine Street, up stairs; where I shall be happy to transact any business in my line with dispatch, trusting to give satisfaction. General George D. Wells, late of the Brazilian service, my respected client, has placed in my hands the foregoing manuscript, which he has requested me to fill out and finish, charging for the same professionally, but at the same time divesting it as much as possible of legal forms, and making it as interesting in a literary way as possible. I stated to the General that I am not a literary man; but, nevertheless, as it is his belief that I can do his bequest, I have therefore only to obey.

When the task of finding the General's long-lost brother was first placed in my hands it promised but little hope. Those who had reported having seen him within the last few years scarcely remembered the fact. To account for this it must be remembered that Mr. Alfred Wells was supposed to be poor; in fact, showed this circumstance strongly in his appearance: therefore none of the witnesses held conversation with him. No clew, therefore, could be obtained to his past or present place of residence. He had not been seen for two years. This was to me a convincing proof of his change of residence to some other city. Under this belief I betook myself to that mighty engine the press, and an advertisement in the New York Herald announced that any information of Mr. Alfred Wells would be handsomely rewarded, on application to Mark Withington, Attorney at Law, etc., etc. Some time had passed away when a letter, written in a female hand, and posted at Baltimore, cautiously asked what was wanted of Mr. Alfred Wells; with a promise that I would answer, directing to Martha Jones, Baltimore, Maryland. Here was a clew. Instead of immediately answering this letter I wrote to Martha Jones, stating the simple truth, which you, no doubt, say is almost an impossibility for a lawyer, but which, in this case, served my purpose best; and leaving it with my clerk to be mailed the day after my departure, I hastened to Baltimore. A few hours in advance of the mail, and a letter of introduction to the postmaster soon settled all that. Mrs. or Miss Martha Jones, when she called or sent for the letter, would be followed, her identity established, after which I would call on her or him personally.

Next day I received a note from the postmaster. The letter had been called for by a tall, handsome, dark-eyed woman of about twenty-eight, who had been followed till she had found her way into a respectable house in a distant part of the city. A carriage, and the lapse of an hour, found me waiting in the parlor of that house while my card was carried to its mistress, who soon entered the room.

"Mrs. Jones, I presume," I said, as she entered. She turned very pale, but in a moment recovered herself, and answered,

"That is not my name."

I did not believe it was. I was sure that so stately and aristocratic a beauty must have a better name than Jones. I said something about a letter; what it was I do not exactly remember: I was rather overawed by her great, dark eyes.

"I have been followed, it seems," resumed the lady. "And to you, Sir, I suppose, I may look for the cause. You are," she said, "Mr. Withington"—and she looked again at the card she held in her hand—"a lawyer?"

I must confess I felt excessively mean as I acknowledged the fact. I was never before ashamed of my profession; but in a few minutes I summoned sufficient courage to go into a statement of the matter, and show why I did not wish to trust the chance of my correspondent writing again; and I concluded by saying, "And now, Madam, will you permit me to ask your name?"

"My name is Wells."

"Wells!" I said, in astonishment. Here was a new phase in the mystery. Had Mr. Alfred Wells, in his age and poverty, provided himself with this beautiful creature as a wife, or could she be his daughter?

"Wells!" I repeated to myself in my astonishment, as though I never had heard the name before. The lady smiled, as I suppose, at the expression undoubtedly which my countenance wore, if it was any index of what was passing within.

"Will you permit me to understand this matter, Madam?" I said; but before I could proceed the lady interrupted me.

"I will permit you to ask no farther questions, Sir, without the presence of my husband."

Her husband! That was the very thing I wanted; and so I told her. She left the room; and as I was watching the door, expecting to see her lead Mr. Alfred Wells forth as the representative of that title, she re-entered, handing in a tall, dark man of about thirty-five, whom she introduced as her husband. I gazed at the gentleman, as I suppose, with a foolish stare, and stammered out:

"I believe there must be some mistake here. I am seeking for Mr. Alfred Wells, formerly of New York City, and—"

"He is my uncle."

Uncle! Why the man might have knocked me down with a feather. Uncle!

"Mr. Alfred Wells is my uncle; but I am not permitted to state where he can be found until I am informed for what purpose the inquiry is made, and by whom."

I could only repeat "Uncle" and—

"Who was your father?" I asked, abruptly.

"My father was George Wells, who died abroad many years ago."

Whew! Here was indeed a new position for the matter, or, to use a somewhat illegal phrase, "A horse of another color." My client, the General, had never informed me of this. In fact, I distinctly understood him to say that he never had any children.

"Did I understand you that you were a son of Mr. George Dudley Wells, the only brother of Mr. Alfred Wells, late of New York city?"

"I am."

Whew! again, and I drew a long breath. My legal education was at fault in this matter. I did not dare to tread another step without consultation with my principal. It took but a few minutes to elicit the fact that Mr. Dudley Wells, the gentleman who now stood before me, was fully cognizant of the whereabouts of Mr. Alfred Wells; but the consent of the old gentleman must be procured to an interview, which could only be done by a full statement of all the matter. I left Mr. Dudley Wells and the dark-eyed wife, promising to see them again soon, and promising also full explanation and satisfaction, and in a couple of hours was hastening on my way back to New York.

It required but a few minutes of conversation with my respected client, General Wells, to convince me that there was something more to be unraveled in this case than the mere residence of Mr. Alfred Wells. The General confirmed my previous understanding that he had never had a child, and that Mr. Dudley Wells and his dark-eyed wife were impostors.

That night again we were on our way to Baltimore, and the following day saw us awaiting the appearance of Mr. Dudley Wells in the parlor of his own house. I could see the eyes of my client open as this handsome couple entered the room. They certainly looked like any thing but impostors. I did not introduce the General, as I knew that he would not permit me to introduce him by any feigned name, and the declaration of his own would at once bring about an explosion. I spoke of him as one who sought Mr. Alfred Wells that he might make restitution for some business failings of years past.

"My uncle," said Mr. Dudley Wells, "is unable to see any one on business. He is ill, very ill, he says—too ill to be seen; but I will transact any business for him."

I asked him if he held a power of attorney for that purpose.

He did. I asked that I might see the document. He opened a desk and brought it forth. I looked at the signature and the seals. It looked all right. It was dated the previous day. Mr. Alfred was therefore in Baltimore; most likely in that very house. I handed the paper to the General.

"This is indeed his signature," he said. "I would recognize it in a moment, though I have not seen my brother's hand for thirty odd years."

"Your brother's hand," gasped out Mr. Dudley. The cat was out of the bag now, sure enough. "Then you are my father!" and he stepped hurriedly toward the General.

"I am George Dudley Wells, but I am not your father."

"Not my father? Are you not the brother of Mr. Alfred Wells, my uncle? Are you not my father, whom I have supposed dead for twenty-five years?"

"I am the brother of the signer of this paper, but you are not my child. Thank God, I never had a child."

"What is this, uncle, what does this mean?" and Mr. Dudley Wells, but half-restrained by his wife, hastened toward a door standing partially open. "Follow me," he said.

We followed him through a passage, and were suddenly ushered into a partially-darkened room. It was a moment or two before my eyes became accustomed to its tone. When they did, I saw the General kneeling before a pale and ghastly man, who, wrapped in a blanket, was propped by pillows in a large chair. The General, that stately man, was kissing the hand of the invalid, who only stared vacantly on him, as he sobbed out the word "Brother." It was a strange scene. Even Mr. Dudley forgot, for the moment, the cause of his excitement, and the reason of his sudden entrance into the presence of the General's brother.

The old man (I must so call him; he looked thirty years the senior of the General. His hair was white, his teeth were gone, and all the marks of a man of eighty were on him) looked wildly about the room, fixed his hollow eye first on Mr. Dudley, then on myself, and lastly on his brother, whom he only then seemed to recognize. He laid his hand on his head, brushed back the hair, and looking steadily in his face some minutes, said, "Yes; yes. My brother George, my dear brother. So you have come back. They said you were dead; but I knew you would not die without seeing me."

The General clasped the hand of his brother to his breast. He was crying; I could hear his sobs distinctly. Had it not been so very unprofessional, I could have done something very like it myself.

"Ah! it is very long ago; I have done very wrong, brother, but oh! dreadfully have I been punished; but you must love him for my sake, not for hers, and forgive my deceit."

What was this? Love who, for his sake, not for hers? What did he mean?

"Kneel to him, Dudley; kneel, and ask his forgiveness."

The General had risen from his knees and dropped his brother's hand. Did he have an instinctive idea of what was coming? Mr. Dudley had advanced to the chair of the old man.

"What do you mean, uncle? speak; explain."

"Not uncle, boy. This day I must tell the truth. Father. I am your father, Dudley; I have deceived you. Brother, he is her child. Forgive him for my sake. Oh, George, forgive me, your brother; I did not know the end!"

It was all told. The General stood motionless, staring fixedly at his brother; his lips were bloodless, the color had gone out of his face, and that grayness which comes only once in a lifetime sat upon him. In that moment ten years of age were heaped upon him. I saw it plainly. Mr. Dudley bowed his head upon his hands and wept aloud. The beautiful wife laid her hot face to his hands, and whispered comfort. I alone stood the spectator of this, and tried to persuade myself that I held no interest save a professional one. The old man is speaking.

"Listen to me, brother. Nothing that I can say will atone for this great sin. I am passing away; in a few short days I shall be of the things that were. The Lord receive my soul! I was wrong, but oh! what can man do under the mastery of a wicked woman. I loved her, I adored her, but I lived to hate her, to fear her. She fell; but she fell as much by her own passion as by my act. Oh! believe me, brother, it was so. When that boy was born I took him at his birth and persuaded her that he was dead. The secret was known only to ourselves and to the old nurse who had been her confidant from a child. She made me hate her, and I deserted her. From that moment I never knew peace. The world had no place of refuge for me. Weary year after year I beat about upon its breast, and then at last I came back. It was only then that I knew you had married her, had lived with her, and that she had left you, to lead a life of shame. Oh! the horror of that discovery! The mad frenzy of hate I garnered for that woman! I swore to pursue her if she were upon the face of the earth, and to avenge our wrong as far as her miserable life would answer it. And I passed on my errand of blood. I sought through every city in the land, but found her not. In despair I was about giving up the task, and offering my own life as a substitute—for you—for the love of my brother. And then I walked the street one rainy night, in New Orleans, in the midst of the fever-season. She came to me—close to me; she puffed her liquor-tainted breath in my face—she laid her hand on my arm. She did not know me, the vile reptile! I called her name; she had only time to utter one shriek, and I killed her—struck through her corrupted heart, and then I spurned her with my foot. Since that night I think I have been happier. I killed her—she deserved to die—and I am happier; yes, I am happier."

I can not see that the ends of this recital can be gained any better by dwelling on the after-part of this dreadful scene. Mr. Alfred Wells died upon the third day. He had been for a long time dying—so his physician said—and the coming of his brother only hastened the end. The General has grown frightfully old within the year since these events transpired. Mr. Dudley Wells and his beautiful wife, and their still more beautiful children, are portions of my worthy client's household; and only a few weeks since I had the pleasure of drawing a will entirely in their favor. I had no idea the General was so rich, and I am sure I heartily congratulate Mr. and Mrs. Dudley Wells on their good fortune. I am sure they deserve it. The General is a very delightful man. No time is spent so pleasantly with me as the quiet dinners we take together at Dudley Place. The past, as relates to the family, is the only interdicted subject.

Your obedient servant,

MARK WITHINGTON, Attorney at Law.

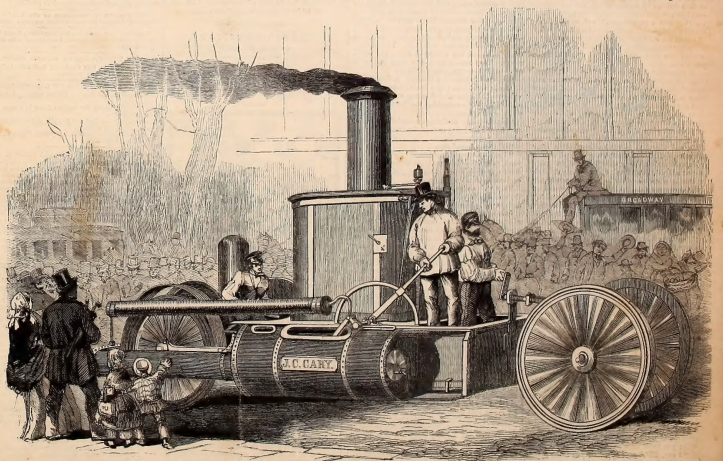
THE LATE EXPLOSION ON THE NORTH RIVER.

THE engraving on next page represents the explosion of the propeller Petrel, which took place opposite the foot of Jay Street, New York, on the 6th instant. The Petrel was quietly steaming up the river; in passing the Broadway, which vessel was lying at her wharf, the engineer came on deck and saluted her; he was still waving his handkerchief when the explosion took place. The scene that ensued is described as being most terrible. The propeller was blown to pieces, and all who were on board were killed, with the exception of the fireman, Downey. The body of the engineer, Henry Brink, was blown fully one hundred feet into the air, and, in its descent, fell upon the promenade-deck of the steamer Broadway, crushing in the deck with its weight, and forcing its way through to the saloon below. The body of the unfortunate man was mangled in the most shocking manner; one of his legs was entirely blown off, while his entrails protruded to the length of several feet.

Mr. Lawrence, the clerk of the Broadway, in describing the scene, states that he observed the little propeller going past the pier, and heard the usual salutation from the steam-whistle; he swung his handkerchief by way of recognition, when she instantly exploded. The smoke-pipe and fragments of the boat were blown in all directions; heard a crash near him, and, on turning his attention that way, saw the dead body of a man, which had fallen through the deck. At a distance, floating in the water, he discovered the fireman, whom he promptly rescued by means of a small boat, and subsequently assisted in conveying him to the New York Hospital.

No cause has been assigned for the accident. It probably arose from the defective quality of the iron in the boiler.

A SELF-PROPELLING STEAM FIRE-ENGINE.



WE give on next page an engraving of the new steam fire-engine, the "J. C. Cary," built at the Novelty Iron Works, by Lee & Larned, under a contract with the city, which, on 5th instant, was brought out and tested before Street Commissioner Cooper and other officials. This engine, from its peculiar construction and its very remarkable performance on this its first public trial, seems destined to play an important part in bringing about the inevitable substitution of steam power for that of human muscle in working fire-engines. It is in the fullest sense of the term a steam fire-engine, being the first ever built which dispenses alike with man and horse power, not only in working the pump but in "running the machine." It is essentially a street locomotive, capable of propelling itself over any ordinary road or street, carrying with it a powerful rotary pump, of Cary's patent, so arranged as to be driven by the same engines; with the other usual appurtenances of a fire-engine. The intention is to keep steam at all times at a working pressure, so that the engine can be started at a moment's warning; the boiler being so thoroughly clothed that a small amount of fuel will supply the loss of heat by radiation, and maintain the required pressure, at a trifling expense compared with that of keeping a force of horses, hostlers, and drivers at all times in readiness. It can be run at any rate of speed which the state of the streets will allow, the steering apparatus, combined with the power of instantaneously reversing the engines, giving to the steersman and engineer the most perfect control over its movements; in fact, it can be brought to a full stop within a much shorter space than an ordinary omnibus in rapid motion. This power of promptly starting and rapidly moving itself to the point where its services are needed, is justly considered by the inventors as constituting an important improvement on the steam fire-engines heretofore in use in Cincinnati and elsewhere. The engine, of course, arrives at the fire with steam up; and as it is the work but of a moment to throw out of gear the locomotive part, the whole power can at once be applied to work the pump as soon as the necessary hose attachments can be made.

On the occasion of its trial, already referred to, the powers of the "J. C. Cary," both as a locomotive and a fire-engine, were subjected to very severe tests. It ran from the Novelty Works to the Bowling Green—the place of exhibition—through Avenue C, Fourteenth Street, and Broadway, threading its way without difficulty through the crowded streets, and ascending at a high speed the heavy grade from Canal to Duane Street, though the pavements were slippery from the effects of the recent storm. It reached the large hydrant near the Bowling Green at a quarter before three; but little time was taken by the members of the Empire Engine Company, No. 42, which had volunteered to do escort duty and to take charge of the hydraulic performances, in attaching the supply hose, and in a very few minutes it commenced work, with steam at 180 pounds and still rising, and for an hour and a half, with such interruptions only as were required for changing pipes and nozzles, continued to throw water in a volume and with a force never before witnessed in this city, and unsurpassed, it is believed, even by the best performances of the largest class of Cincinnati engines, which greatly exceed it in weight. The best results, as regard height and distance, were obtained with a single stream, 1¼ inches in diameter, though the two streams thrown through two 1¼ inch nozzles did nearly as well. The former, when played for distance, was held steadily at 226 feet, and at times reached as far as 252 feet; of the height no accurate measure could be had, but by comparison with the high buildings and flag-staffs near by, it was estimated by good judges at not less than 160 feet. On the horizontal throw the force of the stream was impaired by the thick branches of the trees on Bowling Green, through which it was necessary to play. The quantity of water thrown per minute with these streams was about 700 gallons. As a final test the discharge hose, 250 feet in length, was taken to the top of a two-story building, about 60 feet in height, from which the 1¼ stream was thrown horizontally 140 feet, and a height above the building of not less than 80 feet. From the same position, playing through an open butt of 2½ inches diameter, water was thrown, at the rate of 200 gallons per minute, a horizontal distance of over 60 feet. To the firemen and insurancemen who witnessed it, and who knew what a mass of water by and the effect which such a mass of water and pouring it upon a fire from above is to large a body and with such force, the result of the experiments was at once the most decisive and the most astonishing proof of the power and the utility of the new engines.

After this trial, to test still further its locomotive powers, the engine, with fourteen or fifteen men on board, was run, by direction of the Street Commissioner, through Beaver, Broad, Wall, Pearl, Fulton streets, to Broadway, and thence through Barclay, Greenwich, and Murray streets, to the house of the Empire Engine Company, where, after a short delay, it returned in triumph to the Novelty Works, having won the unqualified approbation of the city officials and the admiration of the thousands who had witnessed its performances.

The remarkable power exhibited by this engine depends principally upon the peculiar construction of the boiler, which is a novel form of the upright cylindar boiler, combining in a degree hitherto unattained the lightness, safety, strength, and safety essential for steam fire-engine purposes. The engines are also marked by extraordinary beauty, modified by a judicious adaptation of Mr. J. K. Fisher's well-known—or, at least, often described—arrangement for application of power to the driving-wheels, for the purpose of propulsion, through the intervention of an intermediate shaft, pinions, and and rubies rods; in combination also with Curry's rotary pump.

THE TRAP.

A DETECTIVE EXPERIENCE.

BEFORE the telegraph came into use the counterfeiters—or "horse-dealers," as they call themselves —drove a much better trade than they do now. When they had started a good bill it would run two or three days—or a week even—before the public generally would find it out. Recently, however, as we have had the telegraph all over town, they find themselves bought up with a short time. Thomas Carpenter has arranged a plan which spoils their fun completely. Just as soon as information is received at any station-house of counterfeit bills offered, that station communicates directly with head-quarters, giving a description of the bill; from head-quarters the news is telegraphed immediately to every station in the city; the patrolmen are called in, the captains are posted with the description to them, and they go back at once to their beats and warn all the dealers that it would be extremely likely to receive money in business—that such a bill is out. So, in an hour after the counterfeiter starts a new bill, the whole city is on its guard against it.

But two or three years ago there was no such preventive system, and counterfeiting flourished. It was a regular trade. I could show you a man, who lives in his carriage and drives his team, who made a fortune by counterfeiting, and has retired —at least, we have never heard anything against him. He was a manufacturer, and supplied the country trade—and, by-the-way, that reminds me of a good story I'll tell you, presently, as an offset to my country "horse-dealer," got "took in." It was while I was with Chief Matsell—say about three years ago.

A messenger came down, late one afternoon, from one of the up town stores, asking me to come up and see if I could recognize a couple of fellows they had arrested on suspicion. I went up, and had any bill bills on them, but thought they might have disposed of them in some way while being arrested: they have plenty of ways of getting rid of the stuff when they fear it dangerous—you've heard of the young fellow who swallowed some bills, and they had to send officer Speeze after them? Well, I had worked a good deal among counterfeiters, and they thought I could identify them; so I went up. I took a look at them through a hole in a curtain which hung before the door. No bills, but were detained in the sitting-room—and I thought I'd seen them somewhere; still I couldn't fix them. However, I determined to have a word about them before they were let go, and it didn't take me long to arrange a little plan that worked first-rate.

They were told that somebody had been sent for to recognize them, and that he couldn't come in the next morning; as they must make themselves comfortable at home—"and you'll only have to about it a good deal at first—declared they'd make trouble for any body that turned a key on them—but, finally, they submitted, as of course they had to. But before they were taken down to their cells I had the gas turned out in the entry-way, and had got comfortably arranged in a cell between the two selected for them. The door of my cell was left a little on the swing, as it always was to do it, and when they were brought down they were hustled in the cells, and the doors shut to; but they hadn't a chance to look into mine as they went by; besides, I was under the bed, so that, as soon as the door, and an old coal-basket hid me well. There was no one else in the cells, and I arranged with the sergeant that, if any came in during the night, they should be put in the cells at the other end of the corridor. It was a quiet ward—never many arrests or lodgers. I told the door-man to be about just as usual, stir the fire, etc.; but to be up stairs a good part of the time.

Well, it wasn't long before my man began to talk; you know there's only grating in the doors.

"I say, Bill," says one, "do you think there's any body down here besides us?"

"No," says Bill; "it's too early yet."

"I haven't heard no one stir; have you?"

"No; I don't you it's too early; there won't be nobody brought in this two hours yet."

"Well then, see here, Bill; just you!" close to the hole; I want to talk with you."

"Mind you talk low, then; some of those d—d beggars may come sneaking down there. I know they'd put us next to each other—but if there's any thing to say you can whisper it. I'm sure you there may be some one brought in before we think."

"Well, Bill, this is what I want to say. This here job of ours is a bad one. I don't like it. I can't think who it can be, but it may be some d—d spy that'll have us put under a line. Never mind that, though; I've got to stand my chance, but they can't hold you. You haven't been with us long enough to be 'spotted' yet. They'll have to lay up before the 'beak' in the morning, but there won't be nothing against you, and you'll step out free."

"I hope so."

"I know so! they can't hold you. And now I want you to do me a favor for me. You can hear if I talk lower?"

"Yes, I can; you're all right."

"Well, there's a man coming to town to-morrow from Orange County, somewhere, to buy 'horses.' We don't know who he is, but he'll look for the signs from Joe—he's been out there; and I was to meet him at eleven o'clock at the Mount Vernon Hotel, and sell him all the 'horses' he wants. D—n it! There comes the door-man! How long will you have to stay here?"

"About a year. Hullo! here's the door-man. Any more news, Jim?"

They gave orders for some supper, and as soon as the door-man was gone they began again. Bill says,

"Tell fast there! our time's short."

"All right. Well, I'm to meet and meet this man for me. Take him round to the old man's, and make as good a trade as you can."

"All right—all right! Go on."

"D—n it! No you don't; I forgot that. I wish that was sure there wasn't nobody down here but us."

"Well," says Bill, "I haven't heard the least sort of noise, and I've been listening."

"No; I'll risk it. He's a new customer, and he mustn't come and find nobody to entertain him. Well now, listen careful! As you go into the hotel, just on the stroke of nine, mind you, take off your hat—if you've got a cap, better—and scratch the top of your head. He'll see you, for he'll be looking for you at the door. Then you'll pull out a handkerchief and blow his nose loud; you're then to go along by him and show him the two-finger sign—you know what that is?"

"Yes."

"And he'll return it, and then you begin talking as you see fit."

"All right; I'll manage it for you. Is the old man all right?"

"Yes, he'll be all ready."

The two rose from the table to complete their arrangements before their supper came in; and it was lucky that they had, for there happened to be an unused mattress and bed-clothes in another cell. The cells were so filled up that they could hardly have been managed to talk if they had not been.

I passed out while they were eating their supper, not taking any care to escape their notice.

"Well, Captain," says Carter, as I came out, as soon as he saw me, "I've you been in there all the time we've been talking?"

"Yes, I've been in there all the time, and never been hearing every word we've said! He's been in the cell between us all the time!"

And they went off, cursing, and laughing at themselves and me and their luck. They'd been pretty sold, and had neglected to blame but themselves. They needn't have been fools enough to talk out their secrets in such a place.

Carter counted me five hundred dollars to let them off; but I told him I couldn't do it; told I had known him in the city for a long time, and that him I'd give him something for the "two-finger sign," but says he,

"No, d—n it! You've got enough." Then he asks me if I am going to meet the Orange County man.

"Of course I am," says I.

"You'd be a fool if you didn't," says he; "and you'll be a fool if you don't let him sell. I'll be bound! Was there ever such a d—d unlucky, foolish piece of business as this?"

They were to keep them two precious rascals at the station till I called for them; and I went away and got ready to meet my country customer.

Just as the City Hall clock struck nine I walked into the office of the Mount Vernon. I had my hat and scratched my head, carelessly looking round as if I wanted to find some one. I was presented to no one, rightly as the country people take out his big red handkerchief; he blew his nose in hand that I thought I should have it all, and I waited to laugh so to think how he was going to be "done," that I really had to turn away to hide my face. This was a countryman, and I wanted the two-finger dodge; but as I hadn't got it, I must get along without it. I walked along by the place where country was sitting, and as I passed by him I stooped down to pick up something, and whispered,

"We're cotched! Follow me out!"

He looked at me for a moment, and I led him to a low drinking-place, where I knew there was private room, just out of Chatham Street, and there we had a talk. I pretended to be very cautious, and asked him boldly if he was prepared to give me the finger sign. He showed it to me at once—this way: the little finger and the one next to it, on the left hand, stuck out straight, and the other two held down by the thumb.

"All right!" says I. "What kind of horses do you want to buy? Any bills in the mark?"

"Well," says he, "I think the darks travel best, don't you?"

"They sell best," says I; "but I never drive myself."

"Why, Joe told me that you were one of the best drivers he ever saw."

"Well, but you'll see, if he, the man who was to meet you—and he is a good driver—has had to leave town for a few days, and he sent me to trade with you. Did Joe give you his name? Carter, wasn't it?"

"Yes, 'cuss Carter. It's all the same to me, as long as you trade fair. If I can find a good dark at thirty" that is, thirty cents on the dollar), "I'm your man."

"How do you like them?" says I, and handed him a five-dollar counterfeit—the one of the drawer bank. I'd got it only the day before from a woman that tried to pass it off in Canal Street, at a milliner's.

He looked it over carefully.

"That's the ticket," says he; "I want a pile of that."

"Well," says I, "come round with me to the old man's, and I can get you as much as you want. Ever been there?"

"No," says he; "I never been to York but once before, for all I've lived so near."

"Well, come along. Follow me a little way off: but come close up if I whistle."

"All right!" says he; and we started.

When we came to the door, about half-past ten —we found it was snowing fast and fibrious. What with the snow driving, and the stores mostly shut up, and my man not knowing any thing, scarcely, about the city, I knew he couldn't tell where I was taking him. I went in, gave him a few turns round the neighborhood, and then out past the Hall of Records, and, in fact, City Hall, by a back door, through the dark passages—he following like a dog—and, finally, right into the Chief's private office!

"Old man," says I, giving the Chief a wink, "here's a customer for some dark horses. Can we accommodate him?"

"I presume so," says the Chief.

"Make him sign the bond to agree; and out he stuck his two fingers, almost into the Chief's face. I never could to laugh were in my life. The Chief was "fly," and held up his two fingers in the same way; not a sign of a smile either.

Well, they two bargained for some "horses" at their "—the Chief was up to all the flash terms—and he was just going to open his drawer to take out the bills, when I whistled, when he looked up and says to greeny,

"Do you know where you are, my friend?"

"Well, not exactly," says he, looking round; "I suppose—"

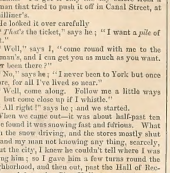
"I'll tell you," says the Chief. "You're in the office of the Chief of Police!"

The man looked up to the door and let out my laugh. I couldn't help it. I laughed till I ached, and the Chief laughed too.

"So you're sold, are you greeny. "You can't come that game over this child! I suppose you have been trying it on some of the boys in this city as I look. It's a d—d good joke; but you can't sell me, sir."

Well, Sir, we couldn't convince that man that he was in the Chief's hands till I took him and locked him up in the cells. Then he began to believe it; and he "took on," I tell you.

He peeved just the man we wanted. We sent Bill to complete it, got evidence to convict Carter, and Bill, and Joe, and two more; and then we let him go, as he was no use to us.



I guess he hasn't been to town to buy "horses" since the Chief "sold" him that "dark" lot.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Since our last issue contributions of Problems, etc., have been received from so great extent—many of them possessing marked merit—that, in order to keep our "long list" upon our Historitian intended with our correspondents, we shall be under the necessity hereafter, independently of the usual diagram, to give weekly a number of such strangems as may be favorably received by the lovers of enigmas; and in the meantime shall take into consideration the most concise and appropriate form of notation to adopt for such purpose. We take this opportunity, also, to inform our friends that we intend to avail ourselves of the proffered assistance of one of the most skilled Problem composers of the present day to act as examiner of such contributions; and on whose award we shall think it based if, in this department, our chess column be cultivated. Among the authors whose productions are now under the consideration of our examiner are the following, viz.: "CURIOUS," J. W., J. L. W., Jos. Cooper, Jr., Dr. B. (Pittsburgh), C. C. L. (Beverley Chess Club, Mass), "JACOBUS," J. S. B. (Buckingham, Va.), H. P. B. (Philadelphia), and some others. They shall all have their favors duly acknowledged soon after they have been received from J. G. W., T. F. S., Jun. (Fond du Lac), J. F. Columbus, Geo. J., J. B., and C. S.; and to No. IV. from A. G. W., N. C. B., G. C. B., F. A. K. (Jamesville, Wis.), R. C. S., Jun. (Cincinnati), Rev. G. W. B. (Canton, Ohio), E. A. D. (Otsego, Ill.), E. J. G., J. K. D., and C. D. A. (Washington), in reference to J. G. W. (University of Va.). Limit as to time for the consideration of merits must be arranged only by mutual agreement of the contestants. In all matches of correspondence there can be no sense of responsibility come to—nay half an hour at the outside; but, for our own part, if we can find out and can't solve in ten days, ten or fifteen minutes, we don't believe he would do so in a week——. If, in this way, we set ourselves right for the composition of Problems have been ever printed. Their would be hard, we think, to find a rival.—J. G. (Nashville), and W. H. B. (Philadelphia). The principal modern works are by Lewis, Walker, and Staunton. The Handbook by the latter is the latest, and we take, therefore, to be the most valuable. You can procure it from Mr. Staunton, 16 Bedford Row, London, or from others. In the blindfold game with M. Gullet, Mr. Harper played the Evans. "CURIOUS," "J. L. W." and "CASSIA" will perceive above that the subject of notation is for our consideration.

4. R to B 2	K moves
5. R to B 4 double check and mate

The concluding moves in the solution to No. V., and, for the consideration and mention of the gentlemen, will be strikingly similar to our Problem II. Had we noticed the coincidence before time, we should not have given it place. We think Mr. K. C. has overlooked the 4th latter, must plead guilty to a little plagiarism, to use a mild term.

NEW YORK CHESS CLUB, 314 Broadway.—We are pleased to be enabled to report very favorably of this flourishing association of amateurs. In fact, we could name no Chess Club in any part of the world which ours could not hold its own, whether for number or average of merit. Most interested at present is on the topic embracing a match with the Philadelphia, a great Chess Club among themselves, and the foundation of a national fraternity of chess champions. Paul Morphy: A magnificent chess-board, with pieces of solid gold and silver, is spoken of as commissioned for the present last mentioned. Whatever offering should be decided upon, we are under low opinion it would certainly be ready for presentation in but a very few days.

Among the Chess Clubs which have taken the signature "Il Stanton," which we printed last week, wherein their Chairman effectually declines the challenge proposed with the great Chess champion, Paul Morphy, has been the only one which has responded to the call, and, at least, the most profound dissatisfaction and regret. For our own part we cannot say that, while appreciating many harsh expressions which we have heard and read touching Capt. M. Chessmen in this matter, we cannot but regret that the Chess-playing world had a full right to expect that the long-beholden trial of strength between the reputed representatives of European and American players would not have fallen through.

Since the publication of Mr. Morphy's match with Herr Harrwitz, he appears to have been comparatively inactive. His engagements have been occupied by visits, mess from visiting Paris, and Mr. H., anxiously looked for by hosts of admirers and friends at home, can only afford further time for travel on his Quixotic journey in pursuit of which he has already made his circuit of the civilized field. We may look for him toward the end of the ensuing year.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

THE BATTLE OF LIFE.—"As much honor as you like, my son, but a very small share of money-getting."

A MESSAGE TO BE WHISPERED IN THE EAR OF THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.—"It's never too late to mend."

THE FEAST OF GENIUS.—"You may have a dozen kites, but it requires a very knowing hand indeed to be able to fly even one of them."

THE EXPERIENCE OF AN OLD JOKER.

There are jokes, like diamonds, that take infinitely more time to find than to polish.

SHORTFELLOW SUMS UP LONGFELLOW.

Miles Standish, old Puritan soldier, courts gal Priscilla by proxy.

Gal likes the proxy the best, so Miles in a rage takes and breaks it off.

Folks think he's killed, but he ain't, and comes back, as a friend of the family.

If you call the tale Standish staff poetry, Punch will soon send you a lot of Miles.

THINGS NOT GENERALLY KNOWN.

That there is a good deal to encourage a man in Patrick, a man who has had the privilege of picking up his English pronunciation in the streets of Dublin, a native of the Emerald Metropolis, a family from Lancashire, a Scotch doctor, a Welsh half-blood, and a Dutch Sweet Lassage.

That Plutus, Pluto, and Plutarch are only different names of the same deity.

That, as a general rule, monkeys are extremely likely to be delicate if exposed to their proper climate.

That when Saturn devoured his own children a mega-Dentum pie formed one of the dishes at the feast.

That a geologist is very likely to be a partial auriferous, though regardless gentleman in the matter of a sepulchre, he is sure to be properly attentive to the position of his grave.

THOUGHTS WHILE WAITING FOR THE NEXT OMNIBUS.

To confound wealth with happiness is to mistake the means for the end. The rich may be well fed, but a lark and fork would give you an appetite.

The wealthy accomplishment to receive from another confers more pleasure than the biggest compliment we say to ourselves.

Most fashions are ridiculous, but one is obliged to twist into the shape in order to avoid appearing more ridiculous.

EXPLODING THE TRUTH.—Columbus, in his peculiar line of discovery, and new way of bringing continents to the new earth, must have taken a leaf from the book the Atlantic Telegraph; and more especially must this larger name be considered so, from what we have been told at his time into consideration, as compared with the enlightenment of the present period. Never let it be forgotten that Columbus had but one pole to guide him in his search of a new continent. The Atlantic Telegraph, on the other side, has had the advantage of two poles—a positive and a negative pole. And yet, with this interior error, Columbus discovered an America, whereas the Atlantic Telegraph is still in search of an Europe or some spot, with the exception of Ireland.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

Franklin Square, Monday, Nov. 15, 1858.

The foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Nov. 13, 1858	$2,917,879....	$870,810
Corresponding week, 1857	2,372,183....	1,426,905
Decrease	$545,696
Increase		$555,095

The export of specie was only $142,136. It is uncertain how much specie has been sent to the South, but it is not likely that much has gone, and we received on Friday $1,664,634 from California. It is probable, therefore, that the banks now hold about $27,750,000 in coin. The Sub-Treasury balance has fallen below eight millions.

Money is, if anything, cheaper than it was last week. Loans are freely offered on all securities on call, at 3 per cent., and the best short paper is done at 4; good paper at ninety days is taken at bank at 4½ to 5½.

Stocks are much lower than they were at this time last week. The reports of earnings which have been published show that the Western roads are earning no money; and this must, of course, be the rule with such lines as New York Central, which depend on them for business. The following has been the course of the market for the past week:

	Nov. 6.	Nov. 13.
Missouri 6's	89½	89¾
New York Central	83¾	82½
Erie	16¾	16¼
Hudson River	32	32¾
Reading	51¼	50¾
Panama	119	119
Michigan Southern, guaranteed	52¾	51
Michigan Central	55	53
Galena	75¼	73¼
Rock Island	65¾	64¼
Illinois Central	83¾	79¼
Pacific Mail	106¾	103

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

New York, Monday, Nov. 15, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets have exhibited increased vigor for Flour, which has been in good demand at improved prices. Wheat and Rye have been held above the views of buyers. Hence they have been lightly dealt in. Corn opened briskly and buoyantly, but closed heavily, with a downward tendency. Barley and Oats have been in fair demand....Cotton has been less sought after, at reduced rates....Provisions have been in good demand at, however, irregular prices....Groceries, Naval Stores, and Oils have been less freely dealt in....Tobacco and Wool have been in fair request at full quotations....Hides and Leather have been active, and have advanced slightly....The Dry Goods trade is without activity. The Dry Goods import during the week amounted to $570,966 against $614,604 the corresponding week of last year....The value of the imports since January 1 reached $53,146,673 against $86,790,043 the same week last year. The movements in other commodities were moderate, and uproductive of any remarkable alterations.

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Poor to premium Beeves, per pound	$ 5	@	$ 9
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head	25 00	@	65 00

A substitute for Paper, Straw, or any other article used under Carpets or Oil Cloths. It is peculiarly soft to the tread, is a muffler of sound, and protects the carpets from the unevenness of badly constructed floors. It also adds greatly to the warmth of a room by preventing the cold air from passing through the seams of the floor, and is less liable to fire than any other article ever used. The material used in this lining renders it a sure protection against moth. To be had at any of the principal Carpet Stores in the cities. HARDING'S EDITIONS
OF THE
HOLY BIBLE.

The subscribers have recently stereotyped several new sets of plates of Family Bibles, the type of which is clear, beautiful, and of extra large size. The text is the most reliable, being carefully revised and corrected, from the Original Edition of the year 1610. These editions are printed in the very best manner, upon fine white paper, and illustrated with numerous fine steel plates and brilliant illuminations, new family record, &c. The binding embraces every variety of finish, rich turkey morocco, antique, and other magnificent styles. The prices are greatly reduced to suit the wants of the times, varying from one to fifty dollars, thereby placing a copy of the Holy Bible within the reach of every family in the land, however limited its means.

At 13 cents, put up so they will never crack or change by time or climate.

THE SAME, CONCENTRATED.
The ingredients of the above are concentrated by evaporation with muriate of lime in vacuum, and of the extract so pressed are made the Sarsaparilla, or Life Addition Pills. Experience has proved them to possess the alterative qualities of blue pill, though purely vegetable in their composition. Those who use blue pill habitually, or otherwise, are deeply interested in the Life Addition Pills. Their use will cure what blue pill at best but relieves. In fevers, in chronic affections of the bones and ligaments, these pills are indeed miraculous in their powers, turning, as it were, the very current of death backward, and as a mild aperient they are without a rival. Dose, one pill—price 50 cents per box.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

With the present Number Harper's New Monthly Magazine commences another Volume of its publication. The Publishers believe that the Seventeen Volumes now issued contain a larger amount of valuable and attractive reading than will be found in any other periodical of the day. The best Serial Tales of the foremost Novelists of the time: Lever's "Maurice Tiernay," Bulwer Lytton's "My Novel," Dickens's "Bleak House" and "Little Dorrit," Thackeray's "Newcomes" and "Virginians," have successively appeared in the Magazine simultaneously with their publication in England. The best Tales and Sketches from the Foreign Magazines have been carefully selected, and original contributions have been furnished by Charles Reade, Wilkie Collins, Mrs. Gaskell, Miss Mulock, and other prominent English writers.

The larger portion of the Magazine has, however, been devoted to articles upon American topics, furnished by American writers. Contributions have been welcomed from every section of the country; and in deciding upon their acceptance the Editors have aimed to be governed solely by the intrinsic merits of the articles, irrespective of their authorship. Care has been taken that the Magazine should never become the organ of any local clique in literature, or of any sectional party in politics. The following List, which contains the names of less than one half of those who have furnished articles for its pages, will show the amount and variety of the talent which has been enlisted in support of the Magazine:

THE MODERN STYLE ADOPTED BY PARENTS IN TRAINING THE RISING GENERATION.—TIME, 12 P.M.

Scene.—PATER FAMILIAS in Library, deeply engaged in Ledgers, Bills, &c. Enter Young Hopeful.

"Ah, William! yes—it's you, is it? Well!—have—I not insisted on your being at home at 9 o'clock, eh? But never mind; I am so busy just now—can't talk to you. Go to your Mother, William—and try to be a better boy!" (Exit William, whistling." Had I a donkey wet wouldn't go," &c.)

Scene.—Kind and Affectionate MOTHER. "Dear William (he is so cold, poor dear, being out in the night sir)—William, have you seen your Father?"

"Yes—hic—Ole Guv'nar hard at it—expected a row—hic. Ole Feller, I'll lick him some—hic—day—will—sure—hic."

"Now dear, do not talk in such a manner. You will be a good boy, won't you? Give me your Pistol, Willie, do! you know you are at home, now! I'll take good care of it for you; and when you wish it to-morrow, I will give it you. There, now, be a good Willie, and obey your Mother (gives her his Revolver). I was certain you would listen to your Mother! What a kind, obedient child I have got, to be sure!"

Mr. WORDLES is anxious to accustom his horse to the sound of firearms, and hires a boy to fire off a gun as he turns the corner. The experiment is not very successful.

BEAUTIFUL SNOW.

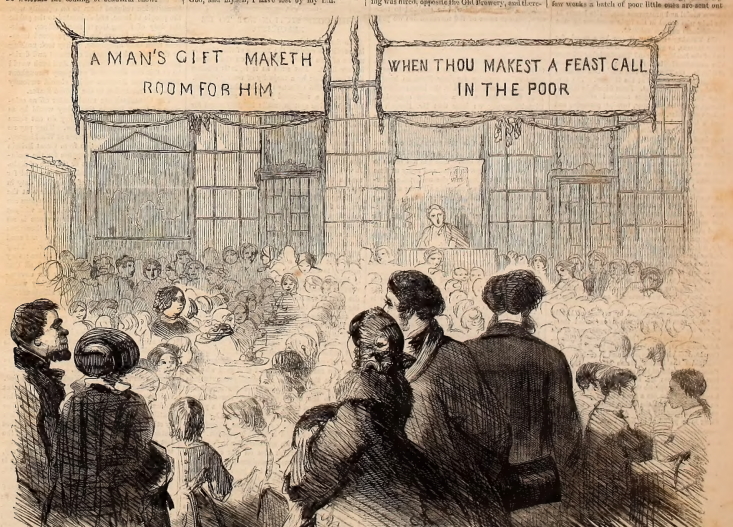
Oh! the snow, the beautiful snow,
Filling the sky and the earth below;
Over the house-tops, over the street,
Over the heads of the people you meet;
Dancing,
Flirting,
Skimming along.
Beautiful snow! it can do nothing wrong.
Flying to kiss a fair lady's cheek;
Clinging to lips in a frolicsome freak.
Beautiful snow, from the heavens above,
Pure as an angel and fickle as love!

Oh! the snow, the beautiful snow!
How the flakes gather and laugh as they go!
Whirling about in its maddening fun,
It plays in its glee with every one.
Chasing,
Laughing,
Hurrying by,
It lights up the face and it sparkles the eye;
And even the dogs, with a bark and a bound,
Snap at the crystals that eddy around.
The town is alive, and its heart is a glow
To welcome the coming of beautiful snow.

How the wild crowd goes swaying along,
Hailing each other with humor and song!
How the gay sleighs like meteors flash by—
Bright for a moment, then lost to the eye.
Ringing,
Swinging,
Dashing they go
Over the crest of the beautiful snow:
Snow so pure when it falls from the sky,
To be trampled in mud by the crowd rushing by:
To be trampled and tracked by the thousands of feet
Till it blends with the filth in the horrible street.

Once I was pure as the snow—but I fell:
Fell, like the snow-flakes, from heaven—to hell:
Fell, to be trampled as the filth of the street:
Fell, to be scoffed, to be spit on, and beat.
Pleading,
Cursing,
Dreading to die,
Selling my soul to whoever would buy,
Dealing in shame for a morsel of bread,
Hating the living and fearing the dead.
Merciful God! have I fallen so low?
And yet I was once like this beautiful snow!

Once I was fair as the beautiful snow,
With an eye like its crystals, a heart like its glow;
Once I was loved for my innocent grace—
Flattered and sought for the charm of my face.
Father,
Mother,
Sisters all,
God, and myself, I have lost by my fall.



The veriest wretch that goes shivering by
Will take a wide sweep, lest I wander too nigh;
For of all that is on or about me, I know
There is nothing that's pure but the beautiful snow.

How strange it should be that this beautiful snow
Should fall on a sinner with nowhere to go!
How strange it would be, when the night comes again,
If the snow and the ice struck my desperate brain!
Fainting,
Freezing,
Dying alone!
Too wicked for prayer, too weak for my moan
To be heard in the crash of the crazy town,
Gone mad in their joy at the snow coming down;
To lie and to die in my terrible woe,
With a shroud of the beautiful snow!

THE THANKSGIVING DINNER OF THE FIVE POINTS CHILDREN.

We engrave below one of the most interesting scenes of city life—the dinner which is given annually on Thanksgiving Day to the children of the Five Points by the Ladies' Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Many hundreds of our readers doubtless visited the building and witnessed the happy feast of the little ones on Thursday last, thousands who were not present read of the scene in the daily papers.

The Five Points Mission was established some years since by some charitable ladies of New York, about to their male acquaintances. A small building was hired, opposite the Old Brewery, and there in school was held, and relief, food, clothing, and soap and water were freely offered to all poor children. The scheme was a bold one. At that time the Five Points were the ancient of New York vice and crime. Pickpockets, burglars, prostitutes, murderers, and malefactors of every line made the Five Points their head-quarters. They naturally regarded the reformers with an evil eye. Menaces of vengeance against the disturbers of their peace were not wanting. Still the ladies who had started the enterprise proceeded it with unflagging courage, and month by month their sphere of usefulness expanded. Even the very rapscallions of the vicinity, finding that the ladies of the Mission sought nothing beyond the good of the children to whom they offered hospitality, ceased to insult them, and secretly wished them well. After a time it became obvious to the principal lady-manager, Mrs. Dodd, that the building occupied by the Mission was inadequate; a more commodious edifice was essential to the fulfillment of the aim of the Mission. At a meeting of the friends of the enterprise this energetic lady confided her views to the eminent Christian and capitalist, Daniel Drew. He espoused them with warmth; and mainly through his exertions the Old Brewery building—the nest of some four to five hundred of the poorest and worst class of our population—was purchased by the Mission. Workmen were at once engaged to fit the establishment for its new uses; and, in a short time, convenient school-rooms, a neat chapel, and suitable offices were contrived. At the present time the Mission is doing a world of good. It is one of the largest and most admirably conceived institutions in the country. Some nine hundred and fifty-one children, of both sexes, are educated daily in the building, and every few weeks a batch of poor little ones are sent out

THANKSGIVING DINNER TO THE POOR CHILDREN OF THE FIVE POINTS, AT THE LADIES' HOME MISSION, ON THANKSGIVING DAY, 1858.

West, under the charge of one of the missionaries. Thus, as things are managed at present, the Five Points, instead of being a nursery of vice and crime, is really furnishing the West with some of their best settlers. The building of the Ladies' Home Mission is spacious and well ventilated. There are two large school-rooms—one for very juvenile pupils; the other for scholars of more mature growth. Both are usually filled. We can testify to the happy and cleanly appearance of the pupils.

Here the Gospel is preached to the poor, and many have received it as tidings of great joy. Many who have drifted to this gulf of despair—this lowest point of wretchedness—have here had their crazy barks refitted, and with new hope have begun again the voyage of life. The records of the missionary present glimpses of fearful tragedies; the terrible present almost effacing the remembrance of the past of promise. Men who have enjoyed an elegant sufficiency are here brought, by that mighty leveler, Intemperance, to the hunger and cold of a garret in the Five Points; women daintily nurtured are found in the extreme of poverty and suffering; yea, there are sometimes to be found here men who have graduated at our colleges and taught in our public assemblies, who have lost all self-respect, all manhood, and who live but to gratify the thirst that has ruined them.

Many striking and touching anecdotes are told by the friends of the Mission. One boy, instructed in the Mission-school, and now employed as clerk in a store, wrote an earnest letter to his intemperate father. The father left his apple stand, and had the letter read to him in the opposite store, and his heart was so touched when he learned whence it came, that he at once came to the Mission and took the pledge.

There are deeds, too, of Christian charity and love wrought by these Mission children. A little orphan boy, beaten and cruelly used by the man who claimed authority over him, ran away, and slept for many nights in a wagon, fed by these ministering children. One of them took him home with her, and made up a little bed in the corner of the room for the little stranger, and then brought him to the Mission-school. There he would have been sheltered, and fed, and taught, and clothed; but, during the missionary's absence, the man who claimed the poor child came to the school and demanded him, and carried him off to his miserable home, whence the Mission may still rescue him.

Five hundred have been sent to the West, and the most cheering reports are received from them. One boy, who had no home and no one to look after him, who sold papers by day and slept in carts by night, was invited to the school by one of the ladies of the Mission. He scorned to come in at the door, but he got in through the window; and he at length cheerfully acceded to the proposal made to him to seek a home in Illinois. Adopted in a kindly Christian family, surrounded by all the loving charities of home, this boy bids fair to have a useful and prosperous life. His letters to the lady who called in the little wanderer breathe thankfulness and contentment.

On Thanksgiving Day it has been usual, for many seasons, to give the children of the Mission and of the locality a grand Thanksgiving Dinner. The commissariat is provided by the benevolence of friends. On Thursday last nearly two thousand children were "dined" at the Mission. The supply of viands was liberal. From friends in Homer, New York, the managers received seventy-four barrels of apples, potatoes, turnips, parsneps, and other vegetables, while friends in Cazenovia have sent a hundred barrels of apples, etc., and six boxes of clothing. Fulton Market contributed one cart-load and one large wagon-load of provisions, and some dealers in Washington Street added another cart-load to the number. Then there were, in the words of the managers, "several loads from the hotels," and private families were no less generous in their charity. There were chickens without number, a whole army of Thanksgiving turkeys, and in addition to these, several pigs, lambs, and enough beef to make three or four head of cattle. All this was cooked at Sweeney's Hotel, and the cooking received full justice. Besides these good things there was a gigantic loaf presented by the proprietor of Crook's dining saloon in the Bowery, which was a perfect wonder in its way. This loaf weighed one hundred pounds, was six feet long and two feet broad, and the flour of which it was made was of the best description. As for pies, there seemed to be no end to the quantity or variety, and however short this year's crop of fruit may have been, there was certainly an abundance at the Mission.

The Mission was visited by crowds of kindly disposed persons, all of whom expressed themselves highly pleased with the appearance of the children, and the general look of the establishment. Addresses were made to the pupils by the Rev. Drs. Crooks, Holdrich, Newman, and Wakeley.

Besides the Ladies' Home Mission, the Five Points is the site of two other meritorious benevolent institutions; Mr. Pease's House of Industry, which is just opposite the Mission, and where five hundred children ate a good Thanksgiving Dinner on Thursday; and the Union Mission, where seventy were liberally fed. After all, there is something to be proud of in New York.

LAST YEAR'S TRADE.

THE official tables of the commerce of the United States for the fiscal year 1857–'58 have just been published. They show, as was expected, a surprising increase in the exports of this country, and a large decrease in the imports. Our exchanges with the world at large leave a balance to our credit of $42,031,271 for the year. Last year we had a balance in our favor of $2,070,000. Former years always left us in the world's debt.

The principles of commerce are now becoming better understood than they were in the days when it was considered a grand thing to have a large export and a small import trade. It is now well known to all commercial men that there exists a necessary proportion between the imports of a country and its exports, and that a nation which takes little from foreign countries can not expect them to take much from it. If our imports fall off permanently, so will our exports; if we desire the foreign world to buy freely of our cotton and breadstuffs, we must buy freely of their wares and products also. Trade generates trade; if we cease to buy British manufactures, they will find some other country from which to import flour and cotton; and if we take all the surplus which the manufacturers of Great Britain can produce, they will take all the cotton and corn we can grow.

It is not therefore at all desirable that our imports should fall below a reasonable figure. Last year we took, in round numbers, $262,000,000 of foreign goods and merchandise; the year before we took $348,000,000. Next year, in all probability, our consumption of foreign wares and merchandise will be nearer $350,000,000 than $300,000,000. And if it exceeds three hundred and fifty millions, we may rely upon it that the foreign world will be enabled to take so much the more of the merchandise we produce.

MEXICO.

At latest accounts the Spaniards were about to renew their endeavors to obtain either payment of or security for their Mexican bonds. Regiments now stationed in the island of Cuba were under orders for a Mexican campaign. Simultaneously we hear that Mr. Forsyth is about to return from Mexico, and that the President is looking round for some one to succeed him.

As to the Spanish movement, it can not amount to any thing. Spain can not afford to go to war with any one. She has not funds to support her own government and army in time of peace. Much less can she undertake a foreign war even against so feeble a Power as Mexico. More than this, were Spain to make war upon Mexico, the old relations of the two countries would awaken considerable sympathy for the ex-colony, and with all her troops and all her ships of war, Spain would probably come out of such a contest a loser. This is not unknown to the advisers of the Queen of Spain. We therefore expect nothing from the Spanish menaces.

The question with regard to this country is very different. That Mexico has failed in her treaty engagements with the United States is notorious; it is also matter of notoriety that United States citizens have been repeatedly outraged, both in their persons and their property, by the Mexican authorities. It may not be generally known—but it is none the less a fact—that many American citizens residing in Mexico at the present time have actually been reduced to call themselves Englishmen, and to seek from the British consular and diplomatic authorities a protection which their own diplomatic agents were unable or unwilling to grant. The Minister and Consuls of the United States, as a general rule, have proved utterly incompetent to protect their fellow-countrymen from violence and rapine at the hands of the Mexican authorities. In some instances, no doubt, their impotence has arisen from their own want of energy and pluck; but in the majority of cases they have been paralyzed by the notorious unwillingness of the Cabinet at Washington to incur any expense or responsibility for the mere protection of the United States citizen. The various Governments of Mexico have felt safe in imprisoning or despoiling American citizens—and they have done so to their hearts' content.

The newspapers of the past week state that the President has resolved to substitute, in the room of Mr. Forsyth, some man of more energy and capacity, with an ultimate view to the re-establishment of law and order in Mexico. The civilized world would rejoice to see such a design consummated. Thus far, certainly, Mr. Forsyth has effected nothing; and if any fresh man could either conclude a treaty with Mexico by which a stable government of any kind could be established there, or could render a temporary military occupation of that country necessary, he would confer a boon upon Mexico, commerce, and civilization. But it is not easy to see how any diplomatist could achieve such a purpose.

The English bond-holders, who are disgusted at the failure of the Mexicans to pay the interest on their bonds, are quite anxious that the United States should annex Mexico. John Bull is willing to forego his jealousy of the territorial expansion of the United States for the sake of getting his interest promptly paid. But it is not so easy as our neighbor supposes to convert Mexico into a part of the United States, either as Territories or as States. There exists among the people of the United States a wholesome and very proper aversion to the commingling of foreign races with our genuine Anglo-Saxon stock. Our experience of a Celtic admixture is not calculated to encourage further experiments in the same direction. Moreover, the annexation of Mexico would revive the slavery question in a very difficult and delicate shape. Mexico has abolished slavery, and established a system of labor in its stead which suits the views of the Mexican people. Were Mexico annexed to the United States the South would naturally propose, and the Mexicans would naturally resist, the re-establishment of slavery there. This would lead to a quarrel which would not improve the relations between the Northern and Southern States.

On the whole, it is doubtful whether, under any circumstances at present apparent, the United States could be induced to take Mexico under their protection or into their confederacy. It is, in many respects, one of the finest countries in the world. In other respects it is the most unfortunate. Its people are incapable of governing themselves. They have not the pluck which seems inherent in every Anglo-Saxon community, however small; they can not defend themselves against robbers and murderers. And they are cursed with a Church which, not content with grasping all the property and revenues of the country, insists on holding the consciences of the people in its keeping, and renders them utterly unfitted either for decent subordination to a bad, or honest co-operation with a good, government.

THE CONSTITUTION NOT TO BE REFORMED.

To the astonishment of every one, the popular verdict is against the reform of the Constitution of this State. The vote on the subject is very light. But such as it is, it is against the Convention by a majority of nearly 30,000. Barely 100,000 citizens recorded their suffrage in favor of a reformed judiciary and a purer administrative system, while 130,000 voted for the maintenance of things as they are. The most striking circumstance in connection with the event is the fact that every newspaper which expressed an opinion on the subject was in favor of the Convention. Not a single journal was opposed to a reform of the Constitution. It would seem to follow that the press is by no means the omnipotent engine men take it to be.

Many reasons are given for the failure of the project for reforming the Constitution. It is said that the people were ignorant of the designs of the reformers. Certain it is that the plan of reform was sprung upon the public at the eleventh hour—was not the consequence of any popular movement or agitation—and was, from first to last, a matter of uncertainty and mystery to the people at large. It is quite likely that many votes were cast against the Convention by citizens who were unacquainted with the aims of the reformers, and who were unwilling to reopen the old vexed questions, for fear of increasing the mischiefs without amending the faults of the present Constitution.

It is likewise intimated that many existing office-holders voted against the Convention, and induced their friends to do likewise, for fear of personally unpleasant consequences. One can readily understand that men who are strong in the esteem of primary conventions should object to a transfer of the appointing power to the State executive; but do these persons control votes enough to defeat a project which is indorsed by 100,000 citizens?

Whatever be the cause of the failure, that the project has failed is beyond question. We need not say that we are sorry for it. We believe that the darkest blot on our civilization grows out of the maladministration of justice; and there is no question but justice is maladministered because the judges are creatures of primary conventions, and dependent on political leaders for their daily bread. Had the Convention abolished the elective judiciary system—as we believe there is no doubt it would have done—it would have rendered a substantial service to the State. As it is, the boon remains to be sought at the hands of a future community of voters.

In the year 1866, the Legislature is, by the Constitution, bound to submit to the people the question, whether or no they will have that charter reformed. At the rate things are progressing at present, there can be very little question what their reply will be. But until then it seems to be conclusively settled that we must suffer with patience the curse of an elective judiciary and all the lesser evils of the present Constitution.

WHETHER THE BRITISH PROVINCES ARE GOING TO BE ANNEXED.

There has been some talk in the newspapers of the annexation of the British Provinces of North America to this Republic. Some of the journals seem to think that in a few years these Provinces will, as a matter of course, form a part of the Confederacy of the United States. One or two extreme Northern papers have gone so far as to designate the plan on which these new members would be admitted to the Union, and their status fixed in the national councils.

The writers who speculate on the annexation of Canada and the minor provinces of British North America to the republic of the United States evince very little acquaintance with the feelings and condition of the British colonists. It may safely be said that no people or clan in the world entertain so lively a dislike of this country as the Canadians. In them—as in many of the old colonies before the Revolution—loyalty to the British sovereign is intensified beyond any thing ever conceived by the inhabitants of Great Britain. And in proportion to their attachment to their Queen is their hatred of foreign and rival nations. No journals in the world are so bitterly inimical to the United States as the Canadian papers; and in this particular they faithfully reflect the feelings of their readers. So far as popular feeling is concerned, it would be easier to persuade Portugal or Tuscany to sue for admission to the Union than Canada.

Nine years ago a movement was made in Montreal and other cities of Canada in favor of annexation to the United States. It sprang from the reluctance of the old British Tories to submit to the wise and salutary system of self-government established in Canada by the British Crown. These old Tories—a contemptible minority in the Province—had, previous to the establishment of self-government, been a petty aristocracy, dividing the spoils among their kith and kin, and lording it over the rank and file of their fellow-citizens. The new Canadian Constitution reduced them to an equality with the people at large, and delegated to the public the duty of filling Government offices. Disgusted at the innovation, they proposed to secede from their allegiance. They took nothing by the motion but general contempt and derision throughout the Province. And such would be at this day the fate of any party throughout British North America which should seriously advocate annexation to the United States.

The Canadians are much better off as colonists of Great Britain than they would be as members of this Union. They do not share our cross—the slavery question. They pay no taxes to support federal leeches at Washington. They enjoy such protection from Great Britain that they are put to no expense for the maintenance of standing armies or the hire of diplomatists. Their foreign relations are paid for by Great Britain. Part of the police duty in their cities is done by British soldiers at the cost of the British public. Their frontiers are protected by the same British troops without costing them a dollar. Their revenue is all their own. They draw hundreds of thousands annually from England; and they do not send a dollar to the British Exchequer. They could gain nothing by joining this Union: they would lose part of their revenue and all that England does for them. Under the circumstances—feeling of loyalty apart—they would be insane to seek to change their allegiance.

RETROSPECT OF CRIME.

The Metropolitan Police have just presented their annual report. The catalogue of crime is formidable, and we are sorry to say that the commitments and convictions bear no proportion to the actual crimes committed. At least half the crimes committed in New York go unpunished. We alluded in a recent Number to the flagrant violation of the law which forbids the sale of intoxicating liquors on Election Day. The police justify their indifference to the breach of this law by stating—with perfect truth, we believe—that not one of the persons whom they arrested at the last election for selling liquor has been prosecuted. So it is; where the police do their duty, the District Attorney neglects his; where he is ready to act, they are remiss; between the two, rogues are sure to escape.

The following table will show the nativity of the individuals arrested for crime in this city: "Ireland, 36,065; United States, 10,208; Germany, 5932; England, 2598; Scotland, 886; France, 367; Canada, 201; Italy, 157; Spain, 47; Poland, 43; Sweden, 20; Norway, 11; Holland, 10; Prussia, 10; China, 8; West Indies, 6; Denmark, 6; Switzerland, 8; Belgium, 2; Nova Scotia, 1; Mexico, 1; Chili, 1; Unknown, 4287."

Such tables as this will tend to console us for the injury which is inflicted upon the country at large by the large decrease in the emigration from Ireland.

THE LOUNGER.

MOUNT VERNONANA.

"MR. LOUNGER,—What do you think of the agreement of Mr. Edward Everett to write for the New York Ledger? Yours truly, ?"

Look a moment and see.

Mr. Everett is not only a scholar, but he is a valetudinarian, and a person of fastidious taste and liberal fortune. He is also an orator of fame greater than that of any American. He has, moreover, reached an age that relieves him from the control of the fiery impulses and passionate aspirations of youth. Upon the evening of the 22d February, now nearly three years since, he charms his native Boston* with the smooth sweetness of his oration upon Washington, and resolves to appropriate all the proceeds accruing from that discourse to the purchase of Mount Vernon. He comes to New York, which offers him the freedom of the city. And thenceforth he goes up and down the land, and, in large towns and small ones, crowds gather and hang upon his voice while he repeats his oration. The crowds pay an admission fee. Mr. Everett devotes all the receipts to the great object; and when the ladies step forward to hail him in his work he lays at their feet some thirty or forty thousand dollars.

The ladies solicit subscriptions, and Mr. Everett speaks. The country is charmed to see its women hastening the pious work. And it is a good, a generous, and a patriotic work. It is a shame that it is not effected spontaneously—that we can suffer Congress to spare thousands of dollars for trade, but not a cent for filial piety!

Now when a man says to Mr. Everett that he will give him ten thousand dollars for the Mount Vernon purchase, if Mr. Everett will write a series of articles for his paper, he merely proposes to him to continue his work—only instead of preparing something for two or three thousand people to hear, he is to prepare something for two or three hundred thousand to read.

And who is to judge of the "dignity" of the medium? Would it not be "dignified" for Mr. Everett to make five thousand dollars by delivering his "Washington" in a circus-building, or a market, or a warehouse, or a railroad dépôt? Can not the theme and the speaker and his eloquence "dignify" any place in which he chooses to stand?

The New York Ledger, so far as we have noticed, is a paper of perfect decorum. It is a proof of its proprietor's sagacity that it is so. It is free from the usual faults of journals—malice and bitter partisanship. It is devoted strictly to the amenities of literature. Along its columns the gusts of politics never blow.

Among those columns Mr. Everett can walk as calmly as Plato under those of the Academy. And if he will only talk as wisely, there will probably be very little more trouble about the "dignity" of his position.

BIRDS IN THE BUSH.

THERE are probably as sweet birds in the woods as we have ever heard sing. The other day it seemed as if all the warblers were on our side of the sea; but suddenly two new names come floating over, as if old Europe wished her upstart child to know that she yet had treasures left.

Place aux dames. Here is Mademoiselle Miolan, now Madame Carvalho, "quite without a rival in her sex." A more wonderful vocalist than Sontag, Persiani, or Cinti Damoreau. She easily achieves the impossible. Her intonation is infallible. "There is no genuine music-lover who, having once heard her, would not willingly go any distance on foot to hear her again." But her voice is thin, expressionless, and unsympathetic.

Enter Monsieur Faure. "The most perfect singer in Europe." Not yet twenty-eight, and has a voice of such compass that he can sing both William Tell and Arnold in Rossini's opera. A profound musician, with a style and method like those of Crescentini and Nozzari, heroes of seventy years ago. He is exceedingly handsome, has splendid costumes, and has forced the Opera Comique in Paris to give him fabulous prices.

All this we learn from a lively correspondent of the Boston Courier. But we confess the picture is sobered a little by a stray remark in another part of the letter. He speaks of Frezzolini as "one of the last really great singers of Italian music." And if that be his standard of great singing, what are we to think of Miolan and Faure?

But in none of their foreign theatres can they sing Don Giovanni as we have heard it sung lately in New York. Let Miolan and Faure approach, and New York will decide their claims!

LATEST FROM JUPITER.

THE Lounger, grateful to his correspondent N. R. for the present intelligence, would also be very glad of any tidings from Saturn or Mercury, or any where else in the neighborhood.

"If Jupiter is inhabited by human beings formed like ourselves, but bearing the same proportion in size to that planet as we to ours; if it contains, equally proportioned, the same species of animals; if all inventions, conveniences, and contrivances—such as dwellings, carriages, steamboats—in fact, if every thing is similar there to what we have on earth, but fourteen hundred times larger, the dimensions, by earthly measurement, will be something like this:

"A Jupitarian gentleman will stand, in his stockings, about eight thousand feet, or twenty-four times the height of the steeple of Trinity Church, or over one mile and a half. One of his feet will occupy sufficient ground for fifty houses twenty-five feet front, one hundred deep, with gardens two hundred and fifty feet deep; and his nose will be over two hundred feet long. A mouse will be in bulk more than four times, and a horse over one hundred and forty times that of one of our ordinary houses. A street like Broadway, in a Jupitarian city, would stretch once and a half across the Atlantic, and in width as far as from New York to Yonkers. The roof of a Jupitarian dwelling-house must exceed in height three piled up Chimborazos, and in one of its parlors a Mount Blanc will find room. A carriage from Jupiter would be too large to stand across Manhattan Island, and a steamboat would take up a berth all the way to Poughkeepsie; but, to contain it, the Hudson would have to be widened to three times its present width. A Jupitarian cigar would encumber half the width of Broadway, thirty to forty feet high, from Chamber to Canal; and all the human beings that inhabit our earth could be amply accommodated in a Jupitarian house, equal to a forty feet square house with us, having seven thousand stories, ten feet high, and covering an area of three millions one hundred and thirty thousand square feet."

* He was born in Dorchester.

BLACK FRIDAY.

ABOUT a fortnight ago a boy was hung in New York. It is a terrible story—too terrible not to be often told, that it may be long remembered.

We are not going to discuss the question of capital punishment. We only say that if capital punishment were often inflicted as it was upon Rodgers, it would very soon be abolished.

If society is to take life for crime, it is bound to do so instantly, and with as little suffering as possible. It is bound to do it in such a way that the moral solemnity of the act shall not be mixed with physical horror, or with any circumstance which gratifies the fierce curiosity of a crowd, large or small.

If a man must be executed, let him be deprived of life without a pang, in the presence of the immediate officers of the law, of the clergy in attendance, and of six or eight of the chief magistrates, who shall be, ex officio, the only witnesses. Then let the body be coffined, and delivered to his friends at their house; while a short certificate of the fact of execution is signed by the witnesses, and published in the papers.

Let there be no more rope-slipping, and slow strangulation, and convulsive action of the hands; and other prisoners putting up pieces of glass to reflect the scene; and careless officials joking; and relatives unvailing the face and falling, shrieking and fainting, upon the corpse in the prison-yard; and then minute reports of every detail of horror in the daily papers.

Unquestionably more people are demoralized by the reports of such scenes than can possibly be benefited by knowing that they occur. And if there be any reason for having executions comparatively private, as the law enacts, the same reason should prevent their being made public in the newspapers.

It is "news" indeed. But so it is "news" that decent men are sometimes seen in gambling-houses and other places; but the facts are not therefore to be published and served up to the family in the morning. Such reports are not published to promote public order, but to pander to a prurient curiosity.

It is high time, too, that the gallows, the clumsy contrivance of a barbarous age, should give place to a surer instrument. If the object of capital punishment be to deter criminals by physical suffering, let us roast our murderers at slow fires. If the object be to show that society conceives the offender to have proved that his life is too dangerous to be endured, then let his life be taken in the surest way science can invent. The guillotine and the garrote are both better than the gallows, for they spare the spectator even the appearance of suffering in the victim.

ONE AND ALL.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—Some of your readers have accused me of inconstancy, and say that I have addressed half a dozen ladies through your columns with equal warmth of affection. I repel the accusation indignantly. Like the old poets, I like to address the beloved one under a variety of endearing names. Victoria Regina, A. H., and the rest, are all one and the same person. I am a single minded individual, and do not believe in minced hearts. I will not call myself "whole souled," for that epithet is usually applied to the "early called," like "the late lamented William Poole," who were "lovely and pleasant in their lives" and liberal of drinks and treats. If any one is interested in my little affair, here is the result.

SONG.

"My love is mine! my love is mine!
What have I done to be so blest?
Is it for me those sweet eyes shine,
And say, 'I love thee—be at rest!'

"Alas! I know she loves not me,
But some pure image of her heart;
And yet I dare not say—be free!
Thou lov'st unworthily—we part!

"No! pure and steadfast stars of even,
That gently deign to guide me on,
Ye are my only hope of heaven!
Without you all of life were gone

"Shine on me still, oh lovely eyes!
Till I become what I would be!
Till from my worthless self I rise
To all your faith beholds in me!

"NIGHTINGALE HOUSE, Martinmas, Nov. 11."

RAVELING.

WHAT though Antoine and Jerome have retired, Francois and Gabriel, in immortal youth, will still delight our eyes—will still be flattened like pancakes and expanded like balloons—will still dive through clock-faces and reappear under hats. They preach perpetual sermons upon politics—by illustration. They show the virtues and possibilities of India-rubber. There is no knot so intricate that they will not tie it with their bodies. There is no knot-hole so imperceptible that they will not dart through it like light through a key-hole.

The Ravels, namely; who else? New York might as well undertake to pass a winter without Christmas as without the Ravels. In fact, what is Christmas without those wonderful winks and motions, that fun and fairy which belong to the Ravels?

Perhaps they are human beings like the rest of us. Quite probably they are. Possibly they eat dinner, and drink lager beer, and go to bed between sheets, and snore, like other men. But why should they? why don't they pillow their chins upon the Orient wave when they are tired, and dine with Dr. Veron when they are hungry? Why don't they sleep in the great bed of Ware, and drink out of the Heidelberg tun? Why don't they go shopping with the purse of Fortunatus or Baron Rothschild and buy handsomer dresses than Eugénie? Why not pull Louis Napoleon's nose, clap the Pope on the back, and take snuff with the Grand Lama? What on earth do they wear hats and bonnets for, and pay board? Why don't they swallow the napkin, and appease the landlord by pulling a dozen silver forks out of the salt cellar? and when the landlady complains vault from her shoulder to the ceiling and disappear through the ventilator?

To think of their condescending to live like the rest of us, who can never hope to jump through the eye of a needle! To think of their quietly walking down stairs instead of descending lightly upon sheeny vans. It teaches us all humility. Let us, then, go and take front seats, and learn humility.

MANNERS AND MORALS.

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—I am a young housekeeper, with means comfortable, but not overabundant. Last week, with the approval of my husband, whose wishes I always consult in such cases, I made up my mind to invite a small party of my relatives and friends to take tea and spend the evening with us socially. Accordingly, I called upon and invited some five-and-twenty, all of whom accepted my invitation, and apparently with great pleasure. Having, at considerable labor and expense, provided refreshments sufficient in quantity and variety for all of my guests, judge of my feelings when more than one-half of them failed to come; and not only did not come, but, having promised, did not think it worth while, by note or message, to apprise me of their defection. The consequence was, that I and those friends who did come were kept nervously waiting more than an hour beyond tea-time, and had then to sit down to a tea which was not more than half enjoyed.

"Now, Mr. Lounger, not being a fashionable, or much of a society, woman myself, I beg to inquire whether, in your opinion, the absentees acted as became ladies, or treated me with justice, on the occasion referred to? Is such treatment kind, courteous, or polite? It has occurred to me that your position may enable you to save some of your lady friends, by justly denouncing such (as it seems to me) thoughtless and heartless conduct.
"Yours, MIGNIONETTE.

"P.S.—The Rev. Mr. Milburn, in a late lecture on 'What a Blind Man saw in England,' stated that when a gentleman there accepted an invitation to dine with a friend, a note of the fact was carefully entered into his memorandum-book, and that nothing less than a broken leg, the death of his wife, or some such calamity, would prove a satisfactory excuse for not punctually observing his appointment. Would that similar engagements were held more sacred with us than they are!"

—If each one of these guests had known he was to find a thousand dollars in his tea-cup he would certainly have gone—or, if inevitable accident prevented, would have taken painful care to explain his absence. Can we, then, not do for love, among friends, what we would do for money?

If you can suppose cows and horses invited to pasture, but not hungry, you can fancy them doing precisely as the friends of "Mignionette" did—not going, and saying nothing. But shall we look to the stable for our manners? Politeness is not superficial. It is a matter of the heart. It is the pleasant and comely acknowledgment of mutual humanity. A humane man can no more slight a kind word, or look, or request, than he could strike a child. All kindness has the appealing quality of childhood. It is both beautiful and dependent when it asks something.

If a person can not take the trouble to recognize kindness he is not very likely to do a kindness. He betrays his own selfishness. The persons mentioned by "Mignionette" were probably only selfish. Will they, and all inclined to do like them, not be made a little more thoughtful by her note?

BULL AND BRIGHT.

ONE of the most remarkable of recent events is Mr. John Bright's speech at Birmingham. Bull and Bright do not pull exactly together, but Bright pulls in the direction in which Bull must ultimately draw.

His speech was made actually at Birmingham, but really to England and to all who watch with interest English development. The English press, except the extremely radical, criticises it very sharply. But although Mr. Bright has been ill, his speech is by no means sick. It is a remarkably robust and hearty speech, or rather speeches, for there were two, or one in two parts. It is a very significant speech, also; for when thoughts are openly uttered by public men in England, they are thoughts that have been long maturing. English orators pay the English public the compliment of believing that if they speak too suddenly and rashly they will not be heard with much respect afterward, nor be so likely to attain public position.

When, therefore, a man like John Bright makes a speech and England listens, and the universal English press comments, whether favorably or adversely, we may be very sure that the speech is significant.

And well it may be. For in ancestral England—in England where a vast mass of the laboring people are workmen in factories—a man says in the chief factory town, "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve. If the peers are to be your masters, as they boast that their ancestors were the conquerors of yours, serve them. But if ye will serve only the laws of your country—and laws in the making of which you have been consulted—then we may go straight on to discuss this question of parliamentary reform." "I am now going to attack the House of Lords." "I confess I am not able to discover one single important measure, important to human or to English freedom, that has come from the voluntary consent and good-will of the House of Peers."

Fancy Lord Thomas Noddy, or that exemplary nobleman the Marquis of Steyne, reading this some mellow morning in his comely "Times!" What though the Times thunders? What though Lord Thomas swears? Mr. John Bright still asks, "How can I reconcile free representation of the people in the House of Commons with the irremediable and unchangeable dispositions which reside in the hereditary House of Lords?"

That question, once fairly asked, must be answered sometime and somehow; and it is not the least curious coincidence of the whole that it is asked by the member for Birmingham and under a Tory ministry.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"BUNTERSVILLE, November, 1858.

"MR. LOUNGER,—In the Harper of the 13th inst. H. P. A. desires to know what author wrote all his works with one pen. Allow me, through the columns of your valuable paper, to inform him that it is me.
"Respectfully, JOHN PATCH."

—H. P. A. will notice the interesting fact that "me" is the author of whom he inquired.

—"I, the second descendant from the Scarborough, owner of the steamship Savannah, of Savannah, Georgia, must sit down here in old South Carolina," and thereupon sends to the Lounger an account substantially the same as that already published. G. G. U., Worcester, Massachusetts, sends a similar account.

"PHILADELPHIA, November 15, 1858.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—You complain that all the poetry in your 'Letter-Box' sinks to the bottom. I can not hope that the inclosed will rise very high; but still I hope it will not sink entirely to the bottom.
"Yours, S. W. D."

A YEAR AGO.

One year ago, how short it seems!
How soon from us its hours have fled!
Its by-gone days are like the dreams
That fancy o'er our path has shed!
Each week a withered yellow leaf
Has fallen from the tree of Time,
Its green existence just as brief:
'Twas nurtured in a softer clime
A year ago.

—There is more, but the Lounger can not make light of it. It has gone down.

"SHARON, NEW HAMPSHIRE, November, 1858.

"MY DEAR LOUNGER,—In reference to the loss of Calais, very reliable historians inform us that it was the immediate cause of Queen Mary's death.

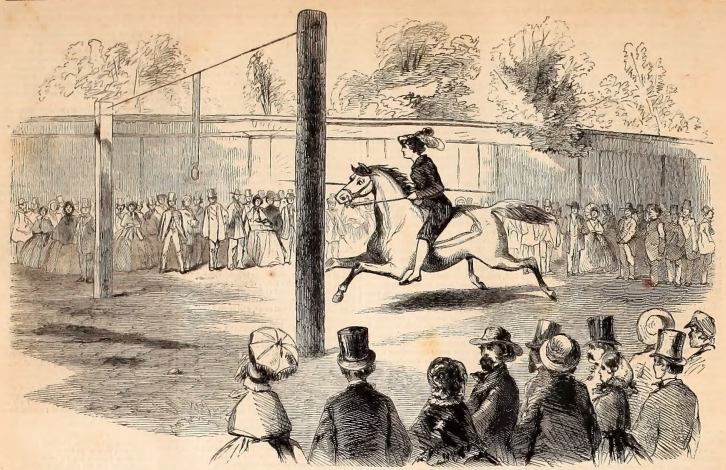
"Calais may have been yielded to France by treaty in the first year of Queen Bess, for the very good reason that the French had captured it the year before, much to the disgust of the sanguine Mary. Indeed, not only the larger histories, but even the epitomes for schools—such as Worcester's, Goodrich's, and Lempriere's—all agree that the post-mortem inscription on the pericardium was prophesied by Mary instead of Elizabeth.

"Apropos de bottes—one question. The word Caissa, which I suppose has some reference to chess. Please inform me of its meaning, derivation, etc. I do not find it in either my French, Spanish, German, or Italian dictionaries, and am half inclined to attribute to it a Sepoy origin, and account for its absence from the lexicons by the supposition that it has been detained in quarantine all this while.

"Will it appear in Worcester's forthcoming Magnum Bonum? Yours,
"HANS ORFF."

—The Lounger thinks that Hans Orff will find the facts to be as follows: On the 4th of August, 1347, Calais was taken by Edward III. of England, after a siege of eleven months. On the 8th of January, 1558, under Queen Mary, it was recaptured by the Duke of Guise, after a siege of eight days. Queen Mary died November 17, 1558; and she it was who said that Calais would be found engraved upon her heart. Queen Elizabeth was crowned January 15, 1559; and by the general peace of Chateau Cambresis, April 2, 1559, Calais was secured to France. The actual capture was under Mary; the solemn cession under Elizabeth.

Hans Orff must wait patiently, and he may learn more about Caissa.



"DEAR FRIEND LOUNGER,—You have a corner in the Weekly where you permit correspondents to let off their superabundant gas, the afflicted to bemoan their condition, the aggrieved to vindicate their tarnished honor, and the critics—to point out all of our mistakes, either in grammar or rhetoric, fact or fiction.

"'DONATI'S COMET.' (I quote from the Weekly of the 8th ult., page 653.) Donati is placed in the possessive case. Is this proper? I understand the possessive case to imply possession, ownership, property. Who gave Mr. Donati the title-deed to this comet, and when was it given? This being answered, when did he exercise the right of ownership or property, or when did he reduce it to possession? I doubt not but that this comet was first discovered on the 2d of June last past, and that Mr. Donati was the discoverer. Besides, I have no other opinion than that he is a law-abiding citizen, and that he does not arrogate to himself undue honor; but somebody else gave him this honor—and didn't somebody else make a mistake? The Comet Donati—would not this be correct, and would it not give as much honor as if s was appended?

"Do give us light. Yours ever,
"WM. T. K."

"BLACKSBURG, VIRGINIA, November, 1858."

—The rule among astronomical men is to indicate comets by their numbers. The name of a person is given in compliment, and for the sake of identification by the unlearned. In that view it is proper to say Donati's or Halley's Comet—not the Halley Comet.

THE ALABAMA STATE FAIR—THE TILT.—[FROM A SKETCH BY NIXON.]

THE ALABAMA STATE FAIR.

[From our own Correspondent.]

THE Fourth Annual Fair of the Alabama State Agricultural Society was held in Montgomery, the capital of the State, between the 1st and 6th days of November, 1858.

The grounds are beautifully located upon the banks of the noble Alabama, occupying a large, level, grassy plain, to the north of the city. The space inclosed is ample, and the facilities afforded for display are on a scale commensurate with the rapidly improving interests of this young and flourishing State. In addition to a large number of well-arranged stalls for cattle, hogs, and horses, there is a finely graveled training course: a grand amphitheatre for the examination of stock, and for the exhibition of hippodromic performances; a commodious two-story edifice for the proper display of mechanical contrivances, as well, also, for the use of exhibitors in the department of the fine arts; a substantial gin-house, for the purpose of testing improvements in the preparation of our great southern staple, together with fixtures for pressing and baling cotton already ginned.

There are characteristic points of difference between a show of this kind in the Northern, and such a display as we are now describing in the Southern States. In the former, distinctive prominence is given to those mechanical appliances which represent the interests of the mighty grain-growing countries of the North and the imperial Northwest. The eye is bewildered by the multiplicity of inventions for reaping, garnering, threshing, fanning, and grinding the exhaustless products of the cereal regions. There, too, are to be seen the infinitely varied modifications of machinery by which the numberless processes of manufacturing operations are carried on. There are more perfect planing apparatus; simpler contrivances for drilling, or boring, or filing; a new cog-wheel; a trifling, yet important modification of ratchets and pinions; some novel methods of printing calicoes, or weaving domestics, or spinning cottons; a new valve in an old piston-rod; an ingenious key, or an unassailable lock. There are men from the sooty forge and the clanking anvil; men from the dusty flouring-mill and the odorous laboratory of some noted perfumer: men whose ears are daily stunned by the whirr of spindles and the clatter of looms; men who listen forever to the groanings of ponderous wheels and the incessant puffings of busy steam-engines.

At a Southern Fair, on the contrary, the eye at once discerns the habits, tastes, and pursuits of a people wholly given to agricultural and pastoral employments. But few machines are on exhibition, and those relate exclusively to the interests of the farm and to the homely duties of the planter. Here is, perhaps, a corn-sheller and separator, and there is a bit of mechanical ingenuity applied to the grinding of corn and the crushing of the cane. And only does the visitor discover at a glance that the tillage of the soil is the noble vocation of the sturdy and happy yeomanry around him, but he sees with equal readiness that the one great, engrossing, controlling idea is the growth and culture of cotton. On every hand, in every variety of phase, is this one absorbing topic represented. Here is a long row of beautifully ginned and securely packed cotton bales, with their fleecy samples exposed to view. Read the label on this bale. It is intended for the cultivation of the young cotton plant. Stop to observe this veteran, one old man, who industriously plies an ungainly wooden machine to and fro all the day long. "What is that concern for, Master?" "That is Carter's Cotton Planter, the outstanding cost entrance for evenly dropping and kiverin cotton seed in the world!" What is the use of all these cogs, and spirals, and files? The answer shows us how young Elliott goes to the planter's gin-house, takes the broken, imperfect gin saws, and in a few hours makes that busy file rest and rewhet every tooth to its pristine sharpness. The crowd rushes toward the discordant creakings of some huge fixture on yonder side of the Fair grounds. I ran too, and am "in at the" packing, tying, and discharging of a beautiful compact cotton bale, weighing six hundred pounds. I see a fellow belaboring best upon twirling a crank for an admiring crowd, and thrusting my spectacles through some cronny in the living wall, I find a man explaining how some cute Yankee, way up in Vermount, is trying to "do" the Alabama planter with a cotton-picking contrivance, full of wheels, and screws, and levers. Thus it is in every ible; you see the embarrassment of the mighty staple in the central fame of this great, warm, shrobbing, Southern heart.

I can not tell you of the various equally characteristic accompaniments. Your readers must imagine the shining faces of the darkeys, their retty white teeth, and their red guffaws. You must not hear of the rolling carriages, the flying steeds, and the panoramic beauty of gaudy finales, the long, trailing throng of amused spectators, the lowing of cattle, the bleating of sheep, and the braying of asinine quadrupeds, the inspiriting strains of the band, in which an important "called passun" fiercely struck the clanking cymbals and the thundering drum, the exciting sports of the arena, the air torn with outrageous noise, when some gallant young Godfrey of Bouloigne, or Richard Coeur de Lion, riding a tilt in frock-coat and standing-collar—alas, Ivanhoe! — bore triumphantly away the suspended ring upon his wooden lance.

A word about this year's exhibition. It was declared by those entitled to know to be a decided success, a marked advance upon former shows of the kind in this State. Very many fine cattle were on the ground, chiefly Devon, Durhams, and Ayrshire breeds. Milch cows fetched at the sales from $60 to $155. Berkshire pigs were sold at $30 per pair. Several fine stallions were in the ring, one valued at $4100. Another splendid Morgan horse, the property of Colonel Ferrell of East Alabama, so closely contested the premium with his costly competitor, that skillful judges required time to discuss their points.

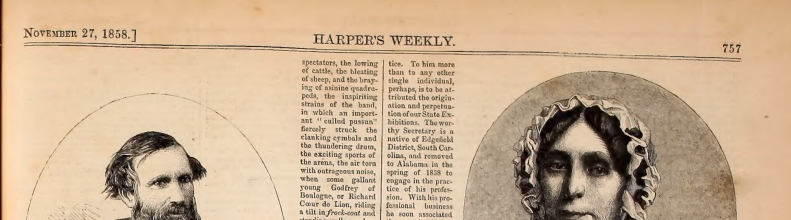
But lest you might take it for granted that Alabama is devoted wholly to grosser pursuits, I am constrained to refer to a fine collection of pictures in oil, crayon, and pastel, together with several very creditable specimens of industrial art, such as designs for wall paper, carpets, table-covers, dress goods, etc., all furnished by the pupils of the Tuskigee Female College. This is the first effort to develop this noble section of artistic genius in the Southern country in connection with a literary institution. As an evidence of the favor with which it was received, the executive committee made a special presentation of a splendid silver pitcher to the College, through its President the Rev. Dr. A. A. Lipscomb.

A new product of the laboratory also took a prize before a special committee of scientific men. It is a disinfecting agent, superior, they say, to Labarraques French liquor. The fortunate discoverer is Professor John Darby, of Auburn, Alabama, a man of scientific acquirements of a high order.

In fancy needle-work, in embroideries, in patch work, in home-made counterpanes, quilts, and similar goods, in leather work, wax and fruit ornamentation, in all these departments our fair Alabamians were tastefully represented.

The success of the late fair is due mainly to the energetic efforts of Dr. N. B. Cloud, the indefatigable Secretary of the State Agricultural Society, of whom an excellent likeness accompanies this notice. To him more than to any other single individual, perhaps, is to be attributed the origination and perpetuation of our State Exhibitions. The worthy Secretary is a native of Edgefield District, South Carolina, and removed to Alabama in the spring of 1838 to engage in the practice of his profession. With his professional business he soon associated the pursuit of agriculture, to which he had been bred up from early life. He was very successful as a farmer. In 1852 he established the American Cotton Planter in the city of Montgomery. — Beginning, under manifold discouragements, with a subscription list of 500 or less, it now stands foremost in the ranks of agricultural journalism in the South, with a growing popularity, and a current list of about 6200 subscribers. Its success is worthy of its active and intelligent editor. — Although great and deserved praise is due to Col. Cloud, the widely-known President of the Society, as well also to Col. Pollard the Treasurer, and to various other influential members of the Agricultural Association, yet the chief honor must undoubtedly rest with Dr. Cloud. I would add, that although "bearded like a pard," and decidedly military in his appearance, the Secretary is one of the most genial, kindly, and affable of gentlemen.

THE LATE MADAME PFEIFFER.



THE LATE MADAME PFEIFFER.

News arrived last week that Madame Ida Pfeiffer, the famous traveler, had died at Vienna on 27th October, aged 61 years. We present herewith her likeness to our subscribers.

Madame Pfeiffer was a Viennese by birth, having first seen the light in that city in 1797. Her earliest youth was disturbed by a vague hankering after foreign travel. She was one of those persons who justify the remark that travelers, like poets, are born to the vocation. She never saw a postilion, it is said, without bursting into tears, and bewailing her sad fate in having been born a girl, and so debarred from the delight of riding post-horses from place to place. Long before she reached womanhood she persuaded her parents to take her with them on a traveling tour through Germany. This only whetted her appetite for travel; she would probably have undertaken her great journey twenty years sooner but for an invincible Doctor Pfeiffer who happened to meet her, and induced her to undertake the journey of life with him. In a word, she married; and two sons rapidly arriving, she found her domestic duties so engrossing that, for a period of twenty years or thereabouts, her innate propensity was subdued. At the end of this period her husband died. Her sons were established in life. And the old longing for travel revived in her as strong as it had been in the days when she cried to see the postilion.

With no ties to bind her, and means enough to undertake a moderately expensive tour, Madame Pfeiffer started to visit Jerusalem, made the tour of the Holy Land, and on her return home wrote her first book of travels. It succeeded. People were curious to read the experiences of a lady traveler, and the public verdict was favorable to the work. Thus encouraged, Madame Pfeiffer planned and executed a tour of greater originality and extent. She traveled laboriously through Scandinavia, and thence to Iceland, publishing the journal of her wanderings on her return. Iceland, like the former one, pleased the public, and was kindly treated by the critics. Her view of Iceland may not be as sound and as philosophical as those of other travelers; but they were more curious and interesting, and were widely read. In the course of this journey she had been frequently embarrassed by her sex and her unprotected situation. Her courage and good sense, however, surmounted all obstacles, and confirmed her in the opinion that a woman may do any thing provided her head and heart be right.

Filling her purse with the profits of these works, and with what little means she had of her own, she devoted the next ten years to elaborate journeys around the world. Her first circumnavigation of the globe was by way of Brazil, Chili, China, India, Persia, and the Mediterranean. This occupied two years, and involved an amount of physical exertion rarely found in the weaker sex. At least once during this journey her life was in imminent peril. A runaway negro slave in Brazil attacked her in a lonely place, threw her down, and cut her badly with a knife; strangers who happened to pass at the time just succeeded in rescuing her from his hands. Her second great voyage was to the Cape of Good Hope and Cafraria, the Indian Archipelago, California, Central America, and the United States. It occupied three years, and was a work of great labor. Though by no means a scientist, and but slenderly acquainted with political economy, Madame Pfeiffer was a lady of remarkable powers of observation, rare common sense, and acute perception. Her courage was frequently put to the test during her residence in the Indian Islands. Many of the islanders are cannibals, and the lady certifies that more than once she would have been served up in a hash but for her solemn assurance that she was too tough to be a palatable dish. In this country she fared well. For a time in New York she was lionized, and civilities were paid to her such as few females have ever received. She frequently declared that the troubles of the early part of her voyage were obliterated by the pleasant recollection of the kind welcome she met with here.

After spending a couple of years in rest at home, and preparing another volume of travels for the press, Madame Pfeiffer again set out, in 1857, on a voyage of circumnavigation. Her first object was to explore South Africa and the Mauritius. She spent some months in Caffraria and the vicinity; thence, finding the labor and perils of internal travel in Africa beyond her means, she crossed over to Madagascar. Every one knows that Madagascar is ruled by a savage woman, who does not clearly distinguish between Christians and devils. This woman had been instrumental in causing the death of many Christians; when Madame Pfeiffer appeared in her dominions, she felt satisfied that the little German woman had sinister designs of some kind or other, and, being benevolently disposed, instead of taking her head off, she ordered her out of the island by the first ship. Madame Pfeiffer attempted, unsuccessfully, to resist. All she took by her obstinacy was a severe fever, with which upon her, and rather dispirited hopes, she returned to Vienna for the last time.

It was in the spring of this year that she reached her home. With her usual energy, she undertook, at once, to write another volume of travels. She persevered in the task long after the fever, which she never wholly shook off, should have suggested rest and absence from labor. Not until disease had absolutely paralyzed her physical energies did she cease to write. Her malady at length overpowered her, and after a brief struggle she succumbed.

Madame Pfeiffer was not, as her travels would lead one to suppose, a masculine woman. She was small of stature and rather frail. Her bones were small, and her muscular system by no means so largely developed as to warrant the idea that she was naturally capable of great or prolonged exertion. She owed to her mental energy her capacity for the great labors she performed. It is pleasant to read in her books that never, in all her travels, in all quarters of the globe, among all races of men, was she insulted or her purity assailed. Such facts prove that there is something good after all in humanity.

ANGLO-AMERICAN MONUMENT AT HONG KONG.

(From our own Correspondent.)

HONG KONG, 10*th August*, 1858.

I SEND you herewith a drawing which, I think, will be interesting to our countrymen at home.

On one side of the town of Victoria, Hong Kong, is the Happy Valley—a delightful spot, much frequented by foreigners. In a fork of the road leading to it is a very pretty green lawn, in the midst of which stands a granite obelisk; upon its base is an inscription stating that it was "erected by the officers and crews of the United States steam frigate Powhatan and her Britannic Majesty's sloop Rattler, in memory of their shipmates who fell in a combined boat attack on a fleet of piratical junks, off Kuhlan, August 4, 1855."

On its reverse, side by side, English and American, are the names of those killed:

Rattler.	Powhatan.
Geo. Mitchell, A.B.	John Pepper, Sen.
Jas. Silvers, Carp. Crew.	Jos. A. Halsey Sands.
John Massey, Gunner, R.M.A.	Isaac Coe.
	J. Mullard, Marine.
N. M. Cliffe, Private, R.A.	B. F. Adamson, Marine.

This appears to be a favorite resort of the Chinese, as well as the countrymen of the killed, in which they may exercise their devotions. Under the tree which shades it are any quantity of half-consumed joss-sticks, left there to burn "for joss."

LITERARY.

IT is seldom that we are called on to notice the publication of a work of so much importance as Dr. Sanger's Report to the Board of Governors of the New York Alms-house, now published by Harper & Brothers, under the title which defines the work A HISTORY OF PROSTITUTION.

From such a subject the very nature of the virtuous man shrinks back with horror, and the verdict of the unthinking public is apt to be that it were better not to publish such records of infamy and shame. But reflection and the perusal of such a volume as this will lead to another conclusion.

It is in vain that, in this day, we seek to hide vice and keep it imprisoned in its accustomed secret haunts. It is vain for us any longer to seek to shut out from our own eyes and the eyes of others the appalling fact that shame and crime abound in our streets, in our public places, in theatres, churches—nay, in our very neighbors' houses. The time has arrived—has long ago arrived—when it became the duty of the good, the honest, the public-spirited, to look this fact boldly in the face; to acknowledge at once that New York is not far behind the worst cities of the world in this respect; that virtue is no more worshiped, vice no more detested here than in Vienna or Florence; and to seek some means for the separation of the evil from the good. When the Austrian Government proposed to license houses for the residence of females of bad character in Vienna, and consulted the English Minister as to his opinion of the expediency of the plan, he tartly suggested the building, first of all, one roof to cover the entire city. Dr. Sanger's statistics reach an awful proximity to a similar idea, since it would seem impossible to find a street, from the lowest in the Sixth Ward up to the stately Fifth Avenue, in which such houses do not now abound. It is therefore but a weak and cowardly shrinking from the truth that leads men to desire any longer to prevent the publication of these facts. When we can not walk the streets in the evening without meeting hundreds of the fallen plying their trade, and publishing, in their painted faces and gaudy attire, the same sad story; when we can not ride up town in a stage toward evening without having the company of daughters of shame, making their character manifest to all inside and outside; when dignitaries of our city are indicted for rows in brothels, and the courts are crowded to hear such trials, and the newspapers filled with the details of them; when our most respectable daily papers seek with avidity, and at great expense, information about brutal prize-fights, reports of divorce cases, or any others which involve the wreck of name and fame, and evidence the debased character of our city population—in these times, we say, such a book as this is timely, and it is folly to say that its contents should be suppressed.

We have no space to review the work in extenso. Dr. Sanger has devoted to it an amount of labor and research which is scarcely credible to one who has not examined the result. Passing, with the pen of an accomplished scholar and historian, over the history of this vice in former ages, and of the legislation which from time to time has been brought to bear on its suppression, and giving a full and accurate account of the progress and of the retrogression of public opinion on the subject in various ages and countries—sketching briefly, tersely (and with such caution and good taste as the most fastidious reader can not find reason to complain of), the story of erring humanity in all times and places, the author proceeds to collect the statistics of England and America, and to lay them before us in their awful simplicity. A brief summary of some of these statistics will suffice to show the aim of the author in his report to the Ten Governors. A series of thirty-seven questions put to 2000 females of abandoned character, in New York, elicited such information as this: Of the 2000, 1400 were between 15 and 25 years of age; 762 were natives of the United States, and the numbers are from different States in this order: New York, 394; Pennsylvania, 77; Massachusetts, 71; New Jersey, 69; Connecticut, 42; Maine, 24; Rhode Island, 18; and so on, in smaller numbers. Of those from abroad (1238 in all) 706 were from Ireland, 249 from Germany, 104 from England, 52 from Scotland, 17 from Switzerland, 13 from France, etc. Of the 2000, 714 can read and write well, 546 imperfectly, 219 can read, and 521 can do neither; 490 are married women, 294 widows, 71 living with their husbands! 933 were formerly servants, 499 unemployed, 121 dress-makers, 105 tailoresses, (showing the sorrowful fact that the ill-paid sewing women are more frequently forced to shame by poverty than any other class of working women).

The fathers of 440 were farmers, of 259 laborers, of 139 carpenters. We find not a few whose position in life would indicate that their daughters must have been accomplished females. 6 were clergymen's daughters, 31 naval officers', 19 physicians and surgeons', 13 lawyers'; 5 were children of "men of property."

Our remarks on the book must close abruptly here. Let it find its way into the hands of every legislator and man of public position in America, and we are convinced that we shall before long see the good effects of the work which Dr. Sanger has accomplished in the suppression of temptations to vice, the regulation of the morals of the community by wholesome laws, and the shutting out of our streets and highways, our theatres and concert-rooms the bold, unblushing sign-boards of shame and degradation.

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS will never cease to be the grandest religious epic poem, and new editions and new illustrations will constantly appear. But we have seen no edition, not even the superb issue of the Presbyterian Board, which surpasses, to our taste, one now published by Carter & Brothers in this city. The illustrations are colored wood-cuts. They are rude, old-fashioned, and strike the eye at first as common and cheap, but on examination they grow upon the mind, they become Bunyanesque, startling, and noble. The faces bear studying, and one seems for the first time now to be making the acquaintance of Christian, Christiana, Mercy, and all the little ones. Mr. Ready-to-Halt in one of these pictures is worth the whole volume, so perfectly is his face in character as Bunyan meant him. The artist has certainly caught the spirit of the Tinker. We can not but think that steel-plate illustrations of the Pilgrim are out of keeping, and that these rude and yet skillful and speaking pictures are such as would have delighted the Dreamer himself beyond all others.

Scribner publishes PEASANT LIFE IN GERMANY, by Miss Anna C. Johnson, who is well known to fame as Minnie Myrtle. The volume is unique in character. The author appears to have visited Germany for the purpose of wandering, without restraint of plan or purpose, among all classes, and taking guides and interpreters wherever she might find them. The result of her travels is a volume full of information and incident, on the daily life of German peasants, in which we find a great amount of new and valuable matter. The book is what it professes to be. It is not a common book of travel, but the record of an observing woman's intercourse with all classes of German society, and it probably gives a more complete idea of German manners and customs than any thing heretofore published. An amusing characteristic of Miss Johnson's book is her stalwart defense of America and Americanisms of all kinds. She declares, emphatically, that no castle in Germany equals in furniture, so far as comfort goes, a New England cottage; and she seems to be amazed at the idea that any German who has once visited America can return to his own land. Her remarks on the custom of choosing wives, and the attempt of a German who has visited America to find a wife after his return to Germany will amuse all readers, and especially those who are from "Vaterland."

NEW ENGLAND'S CHATTELS is the title of a story published by H. Dayton, which is really of more worth than its title indicates. The design of the author is to show the shocking condition of New England poor-houses, especially in those towns where the paupers are sold annually to the lowest bidder, and there is much that is worth reading and thinking of in his book. He writes with force and effect, and, on a more popular theme, would probably produce a work to which he might without regret attach his name.

Carter & Brothers have increased their list of books for the young, by adding SIDNEY GREY, a Tale of School Life; and THE BEAUTIFUL HOME, by the author of "Ministering Children." They also publish MEMOIRS OF MRS. JUKES, a Christian lady from England, whose residence in Ohio, where her husband was a clergyman, endeared her to many who will accept this book as a pleasant memorial of her.

Carter & Brothers also enrich the libraries of all readers of sound doctrine, and all admirers of the good and great men of the seventeenth century, by the publication of ARCHBISHOP LEIGHTON'S COMPLETE WORKS, in one octavo volume. The collection is full—more so than any English or Scotch edition—and the mention of the pious bishop's name is sufficient to remind the reader of the character of all his writings. No man in the Episcopal Church ever sustained a higher reputation for simple and devoted piety; no man was more vilely assaulted; but the dirt that was thrown at him fell off and left his character pure and shining. The memory of those days, when he stood between the Crown and the Covenant, a noble defender of the truth, such as the world saw few of in his day—contrasting, on the one hand, with the unscrupulous wickedness of Sharpe, and, on the other, with the bigotry and intolerance of the infatuated supporters of the League. The memory of those days is precious to all lovers of the truth, and will be recalled by them as they read again the peaceable and peace-teaching works of the Bishop of Dunblane.

Dick & Fitzgerald publish AFTER DARK, by Wilkie Collins. The author has here collected some of his best stories and united them by a slender thread, making them the narrations of a sick and half-blind artist, whose wife writes them down as he relates them.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE LATEST FROM UTAH.

RECENT advices from Utah state that the command under Captain Homes, which was recently dispatched to Humboldt to settle the Indian difficulties reported to exist there, has returned, and announced that there had been no Indian difficulties in that region, as had been stated, and that the story of the violation of the Government mail was false. Dr. Forney, the Indian agent, was on his return to Salt Lake City.

Governor Cumming had decided that the Utah Legislature must meet at Fillmore City, notwithstanding the tenor of the resolution passed at the joint session of 1856, which designated Salt Lake City as the place of meeting. The legality of the proceedings of the last Legislature are also questioned by the Governor, from the fact that they are signed by Brigham Young only, and that too at a time when Governor Cumming himself was in the Territory, under a commission from the General Government, and had already issued his proclamation covering the period when said Legislature was in session. The Governor maintains that the approval by Young of said proceedings was, on his part, a usurpation of the executive authority.

There are accounts of further disturbances among the Utes Indians in the southern part of the Territory. The bodies of two murdered men had been found, and considerable stock had been driven off by members of the tribe.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF NORTH CAROLINA.

The message of Governor Bragg, of North Carolina, shows that the debt of the State is $5,879,595. A large portion of this debt has been incurred by loans and subscriptions to State works. A considerable portion falls due next year. The Governor suggests the expediency of making permanent provision for relief. The revenue of the State is $507,000 annually. Changes in the application of the revenue and assessment laws are recommended, and the establishment of a Sinking Fund is again urged, as in a former message. The State has no military organization, and needs one; a recommendation of that subject is contained in the message. The progress of the boundary survey between Virginia and North Carolina is reported satisfactory, and the great importance of the work is urged. The geological developments of the State survey show that an abundance of iron and coal exists, and Dr. Emmons, the State geologist, is mentioned with favor. The penal and charitable institutions are in good condition. The Governor of North Carolina, like the Governor of Georgia, does not trouble himself about national affairs. He is content with the State as it is.

WALKER FILIBUSTERS KEPT AT HOME.

A clearance has been refused for the Alice Painter, the vessel in which the Walker "emigrants" were to leave Mobile for Nicaragua. A dispatch from Mobile states that the greatest excitement exists there on account of the detention. On Friday, 19th, about four hundred of the "emigrants" surrounded the office of the agents who supplied them with tickets, and demanded immediate transportation or the refunding of the passage-money. The crowd was at length pacified by assurances from the Deputy-Collector that definite instructions from Washington must soon arrive. It is positively denied by Señor Yrisarri that he has furnished these men any passports.

GAMBLING A KEY TO LEGISLATION.

The correspondent of the Philadelphia North American says, apropos of Pendleton's sale: "These gambling resorts have increased fearfully at Washington within the last ten years, and it is notorious that they have done more to demoralize legislation than all the other debasing and corrupting influences which have been brought to bear upon weak, venal, or needy members of Congress. I was deeply impressed by the silent but eloquent witnesses of this fact, when the drawers of Pendleton's desk were opened yesterday, and numerous bills relating to schemes before Congress were exposed to public view. The misery and wretchedness and degradation inflicted upon men and families by these hells are appalling, and even the imperfect disclosures which have reached me accidentally, exhibit a state of morals in Congress which would astonish the country, if exposed. Some of these gamblers, and others who are concerned as capitalists with them, are openly employed as lobby agents, from their supposed ability to control votes through obligations incurred by members, and the fact is one of common town talk, that their tables are the daily resort of a large class of such voters in preference to the hotels.

"Strange as it may seem, the influence has so ramified that it was feared, at one time, in the early stages of the Kansas struggle, last session, when the House was nearly equally divided, that the scale would be turned by a turn of the screw upon particular members who were known to be in the power of the gamblers."

A ROMANTIC STORY.

The New York correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune tells the following story:

"Some years ago there lived in Boston a young man, of one of the best families in the city, handsome, intelligent, well educated, of agreeable manners and address, and exceedingly popular with all who knew him. Still he was most generally known as a very 'fast' young man, and noted for his extravagance in the expenditure of money, his disregard for those conventionalities and moralities of which society requires the observance of all within its pale. The result of such a career need not be described, as it is seen every day in all great cities, happening in despite of the precepts of the judicious and the warning examples of the imprudent. The last chance that seemed to be left for the reinstatement of the subject of our story in the good opinion of his friends, of himself, and of the world, was a voyage in some responsible capacity that should test the sincerity of his desire to redeem himself.

"By the aid of friends he procured such an opportunity, and left his native city as the commander of a merchant vessel, bound on a long and somewhat hazardous voyage. In the course of it he found himself among the Feejee Islands, and having occasion to go ashore on one of them, he visited the rude dwelling of a native chief, who entertained him hospitably, and, as he was about to depart, asked him to pray to the Christian's God, with and for that savage family!

"Here was a dilemma. The attitude and act of prayer had long been strange to the youth, and he was not prepared for such a request; and in default of his ability to comply with it, the Feejee chief (who had probably been visited and taught by some wandering missionary who had casually landed upon that island) raised his voice in prayer, while the native of a Christian and civilized land, himself unused to devotion, stood by and listened! Was not this a striking scene? But mark the result. Our young sailor returned to his ship, and in due course of time to his home. Hastening to his brother, a clergyman of the Episcopalian Church, residing in the neighborhood, he told him the story of the prayer he had heard put up by a savage islander in that far-distant ocean, and confessed to him that that prayer had been followed by an answering effect, in the conversion of him who was so strangely called upon to listen to it.

"He now desired to redeem the time he had so sadly wasted, and to devote himself actively, and in the most self-sacrificing way, to the cause of religion. Steadily adhering to his purpose, he became a church member, a candidate for orders in the church, and an accepted missionary to Africa, whither he is about to go, under the auspices of the Foreign Missionary Committee of the Protestant Episcopal Church. But not alone.

"On 1st instant, the services of the day being finished at Trinity Church, that superb and spacious temple was almost immediately filled to overflowing by a crowd of expectant spectators of a most interesting scene. The clergyman alluded to in my narrative came in and took his place in the chancel.

"The front portals of the church were thrown open, and a bridal party entered and advanced to the altar, where a fair young bride (the daughter of one of the officiating minister's most respectable parishioners) was united in wedlock to the hero (for is he not a hero?) of my narrative; whose labors as a missionary of Christianity she has devoted herself to share."

AWKWARD ACCIDENT TO A BOY-HUNTER.

A lad whose parents had positively forbid his hunting, at Petersburg, Virginia, started out on Wednesday, without their knowledge, on a gunning excursion. He had proceeded but a short distance in Dinwiddie County before he espied a squirrel in the topmost branches of a very tall double oak. This young Nimrod, being an excellent marksman, succeeded in killing the squirrel, but it lodged on a limb, and though several additional shots were discharged, all failed to dislodge the little animal. The huntsman proceeded to ascend the tree, and had nearly reached the object of his pursuit when he slipped and fell into the crotch of the tree, where he became so firmly wedged, that all efforts to extricate himself proved unavailing. Fortunately he is blessed with a Stentorian pair of lungs, which he called to his aid, and made the forest ring with his cries for help. An old colored man heard his lamentations, and procuring an axe, soon relieved the youth from his disagreeable and painful situation. He escaped with only a few very severe scratches, but lost the entire leg of a pair of new pantaloons, which betrayed his truancy to his parents upon his arrival home, and for which he received a sound thrashing, and was sent to bed on an empty stomach.

EXCOMMUNICATION BY TELEGRAPH.

We read in the Boston Courier: "Some years since an unhappy misunderstanding arose between the worthy minister of an Episcopal Church in one of our country towns and a worthy gentleman, his leading and wealthiest parishioner—in fact, the patron of the parish, and, if we mistake not, the actual builder of the house of worship, without whom it could not have been at all, and by whose aid it was principally sustained. The result of such a controversy could not be doubtful for a moment; the priest, perforce, yielded to the layman, and was compelled to resign his charge.

"We will suppose that, naturally, in a controversy of this sort, some high-handed things may have been said and done by the prevailing party which could scarcely be reconciled with the meekness of the Gospel profession, in full communion with which the lay brother was. At all events the successor of the deposed minister, after being inducted into his office, felt it his duty to administer a certain degree of discipline to the offending layman, in virtue of the sacred office he held: and, in fact, intimated, so that it reached the ears of the party concerned, his purpose to suspend him from the communion. To this discipline the gentleman in question was by no means disposed to submit. Accordingly, upon receiving a letter directed in the well-known handwriting of his pastor, and guessing its contents, of which he did not choose to be informed, he returned it to the reverend man unopened. Several similar efforts met with the same ill-fortune; nor was the clergyman more successful in employing personal means of making known his designs; for the recusant parishioner steadfastly refused any intercourse of this sort; and when it happened that he was about to meet his clergyman in the street, 'he passed by on the other side.'

"It seemed a really hopeless case; but who shall reckon the extent of the final perseverance of the saints? And what man can count upon being victorious over the resolute fidelity of the Church? After the lapse of some time, the clergyman was called away from home to attend a convention at a distance. At his first stopping-place, a bright thought occurred to him; he took his way to the telegraph office, and thus, in a mode not to be suspected, communicated to his parishioner the fact of his suspension from the holy ordinance of communion. The latter was struck aghast at first, but saw there was no help for it. 'Well,' said he, 'I see the telegraph is not only a means of communication, but of ex-communication, too.'"

FIGHT WITH A BEAR IN THE WATER.

We read in the Detroit Free Press: "Passengers by the Port Huron boats describe the killing of a large bear in the neighborhood of that place, a day or two since, in a peculiar manner. A man who lives on the American side had occasion to cross the St. Clair River early in the morning, and on the way across discovered a large bear, who was engaged in the same mission as himself, viz., endeavoring to gain her Majesty's dominions. He immediately made for the animal, and being able to make better head-way through the water, soon overtook him, and struck him on the head with one of his oars, having no other weapon. The bear turned on him, and, with the utmost coolness, commenced climbing into the boat, the man, in the mean time, belaboring his skull with the oar with all his might. The assailing party by this time found that he had caught a Tartar, and that he was likely to become the captured party himself. This apprehension was rendered nearly a certainty by the capsizing of the boat just as his bearship had nearly accomplished loading himself into it. The man, now thoroughly frightened, found himself in the water, clinging to one side of the boat, with the bear looking at him over the inverted bottom from the other side. He then made a desperate effort, righted the boat, ducked the bear and got in again, but was no sooner aboard than the bear made another rush at him and upset the boat again. A lively scene of flounderings followed, which were fast bringing matters to a crisis, when the battle was ended by the arrival of another man in a boat, who had witnessed the fight from the shore, and come off to the assistance of the first adventurer. He split the bear's head open with an axe, killing him instantly. The animal weighed over 400 pounds.

PERSONAL.

The Washington Union says: "We are advised by a private telegraphic dispatch from Memphis, that the Hon. William K. Sebastian has been re-elected to the United States Senate for six years from the 4th of March next, by the Legislature of Arkansas, now in session. The vote was nearly unanimous."

The Hartford Times says that the friends of Governor Seymour have received letters from him since his departure from St. Petersburg, announcing that he expects to meet ex-President Pierce in December, at Rome, and that he will not reach this country before the 1st of January, and possibly not till spring.

Mrs. Douglas, the accomplished lady of the Senator, was taken suddenly ill a few days since, an illness painful and dangerous to herself, and the consequences of which were doubtless the cause of much regret to her immediate family and friends generally. We are pleased to learn that she has partially recovered, and is, in fact, as well as could be expected.

General Paez will start for Venezuela in about ten days. He has been waited upon by General Sandford, and invited to be present to inspect the city militia with Governor King, on Evacuation Day (25th), and to lunch with the Governor and officers. The invitation, it is understood, was accepted.

Bishop M'Ilvaine is greatly improving in health, and may be expected in this country in a few weeks.

Mr. Hawthorne has gone to Rome. A book is expected from him next March or April.

Senator Broderick, of California, has arrived at St. Louis. He left Salt Lake October 1, and encountered a great deal of snow and severely cold weather on the mountains. By the upsetting of the stage, some distance west of Kansas city, Mr. Broderick had a rib broken, and was otherwise severely bruised. He also had a foot frozen while passing through the mountains.

The New York correspondent of the Boston Post says: "Cozzens has returned in high spirits from Brussels. He has had a chat with King Leopold and with the Duke of Brabant, and seems to have been highly impressed with the beauty of the Duchess. She is a sister of the present Emperor of Austria, and is considered to be a strong likeness to the unfortunate Marie Antoinette. Sparrowgrass is as humorous as ever, and it is a great treat to hear him relate some of his experiences, his face radiant with fun, and shifting his hat accessorily, in a slightly defiant manner, Young a la America! An old English gentleman informed him that the present American embassador in London, Mr. Buckingham, was a very pleasant person, upon which Sparrowgrass took the liberty to remark that, having a letter of introduction to that functionary, he happened to know that his name was Dallas: whereupon the old English gentleman beat a retreat, remarking that he confounded the name of the embassador with that of the President Buckingham! To relish the story in its vegetable raciness you must have it fresh from the sparkling Catawba lips of Sparrowgrass himself."

Ole Bull is traveling in Norway. As he was lately walking quietly through the street of the small town of Dramen, smoking his cigar, he was suddenly accosted by a police officer, who led him off to the Commissary of Police, by whom he was sentenced to pay a fine for violating the police regulations, which forbid smoking in the streets. Unfortunately, Ole Bull had come out without putting his purse in his pocket; he was consequently sent to prison, and it was not until the next day, on ascertaining who he was, that the official sent an order for his release. The Norwegian journals have taken up the cause of the artiste, and at the present moment the cigar of Ole Bull has assumed the magnitude of a question of high importance.

The Cincinnati Gazette having stated, on the authority of an Indiana journal, that the distinguished Senator who won $180,000 in a gambling-house last winter, in Washington, was the Hon. James A. Pearce, of Maryland, the Hon. Tom Corwin writes to that paper, contradicting the statement. Tom says: "I know Mr. Pearce well; I know he never did play at any game during my long and intimate acquaintance with him. Mr. Pearce is not that style of man."

A correspondent of Galignani's Messenger sends the following, dated Nice, October 29:

"General Garibaldi, cousin of the murdered man, has just left Nice for the little estate which he cultivates on the island of Madalene, a dot on the Mediterranean off the coast of Sardinia. The former defender of Rome is popular in this town, on account of his honesty when in power and of his unassuming manners. He has not abandoned his position of captain in the merchant service, and is about to depart on a South American voyage. His son is also a sea captain; his daughter has been adopted by a wealthy family of Nice."

Colonel Moody, Royal Engineers, and late Governor of the Falkland Islands, is at present stopping at the Clarendon. This gentleman goes out as Commissioner of Lands and Works to Vancouver's Island and British Columbia.

Captain Gossett and Lady Anne Gossett and children are also at the Clarendon. Captain Gossett is son of the late Sir William Gossett, Sergeant-at-Arms to the House of Commons, and is in the Royal Engineers. We believe that he accompanies Colonel Moody to Vancouver's Island.

Mrs. Amelia Pinkney, one of the most accomplished ladies of Annapolis, Maryland, died on the 4th inst., in the 80th year of her age. The Annapolis Gazette says:

"Her industry was wonderful. The records of the State Department bear evidence of a skill in penmanship, and a capacity for business, rarely met with in women. After her 70th year she wrote 1500 closely written pages, full of the stores of her rich mind and cultivated taste, solely for the perusal and gratification of those who cheered the last years of her bodily suffering. When past her 70th year she wrote in six weeks 500 verses of poetry, on the subject of the Queens of England, without the erasure of a line or change of a word."

In the Circuit Court at Batavia, before Judge Davis, Barber G. Buell recovered $1450 in a suit against the Central Railroad Company, in consequence of injuries received on the cars at Bergen, in October, 1857.

Ex-Governor Schley, of Georgia, is exceedingly ill at his residence in Augusta. He has been confined to his room for several days by a severe attack of disease, and on yesterday, we learn, was affected with paralysis.

The Christian Advocate and Journal says: "A young man came up, immediately after it was known that we had increased (by $30,000) the missionary appropriation for the year, and said he would give $1000 the coming year."

Hon. Jefferson Davis returned to his residence in Warren county, Mississippi, on the 5th inst. The Vicksburg Whig says that his health is almost completely restored.

The heirs of Ebenezer Francis, of Boston, besides the donation of $5000 to Dr. Jackson (to whom the testator left only $500), have presented a like sum to Dr. Putnam, of Roxbury, and Dr. Gannett, of Boston. Total, $15,000.

A correspondent from Springfield, Illinois, announces the very serious illness of the Hon. Thomas L. Harris, of that State. The writer fears that he will never be able to leave his bed again. To his many friends throughout the country this announcement will give great pain.

Bishop Potter, of Pennsylvania, made a speech recently in Liverpool, at a banquet at which Lord Brougham presided. He spoke in response to a toast in honor of the clergy of all denominations.

Mr. Jonathan Moses, now resident at Exeter, New Hampshire, writes for a Portsmouth (Massachusetts) paper certain reminiscences of the early years of the town, and signs himself "A Portsmouth boy in his ninety-third year."

Mrs. Julia Branch, who figured at Rutland as the advocate of the "Free-Love" doctrine, has prepared a lecture with the suggestive title of "Mrs. Grundy."

The Wyoming Mirror says: "We are pleased to hear of the improvement of Senator Halsted's health, and hope for his entire recovery. He will be able to be in his seat at the commencement of the session."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

MORPHY AND STAUNTON.

MR. MORPHY has published a letter from him to Lord Lyttelton, President of the British Chess Association, in which, after reviewing Mr. Staunton's conduct, he closes as follows:

"From Mr. Staunton I now appeal to the great body of English chess players—I appeal to the British Chess Association—I appeal to yourself, my Lord, as the Mæcenas of English chess. And as I visited your country for the purpose of challenging Mr. Staunton—which challenge he has repeatedly accepted—I now demand of you that you shall declare to the world it is through no fault of mine that this match has not taken place.

I have the honor to remain, my Lord, yours, very respectfully, PAUL MORPHY.

"CAFE DE LA REGENCE, PARIS, October 25, 1858."

Mr. Edge, Mr. Morphy's friend, thus sums up the controversy:

"To sum up the whole matter, I will state the naked facts:

"1. Mr. Morphy came to Europe to play Mr. Staunton.

"2. Mr. Staunton made every body believe he had accepted the challenge from Mr. Morphy.

"3. Mr. Staunton allowed the St. George's Chess Club to raise the money to back him.

"4. Mr. Staunton asked for a delay of one month, in order to brush up his openings and endings.

"5. Mr. Staunton requested a postponement until after the Birmingham meeting.

"6. Mr. Staunton fixed the beginning of November for the commencement of the match.

"If all this do not mean 'I will play,' then is there no meaning in language. I beg to subscribe myself, Mr. Editor, most respectfully yours,

"FREDERICK MILNE EDGE.

"HOTEL BRETEUIL, PARIS, October, 20, 1858."

THRILLING STORY OF SHIPWRECK.

Mr. John Fowler, a cabin passenger on board the Eastern City, furnishes a graphic account of the burning of that vessel on the passage from Liverpool to Melbourne, South Australia. The Eastern City was a ship of 1368 tons burden, and the property of Messrs. Baines & Co., of Liverpool. She was commanded by Captain Johnstone, and had a crew of 47 men, including officers. She left Liverpool on the 10th of July, with 180 passengers and 1600 tons of general cargo.

According to Mr. Fowler's narrative the Eastern City reached the equator on the 11th of August, after a long continuance of contrary and baffling winds, and the passengers were in expectation of reaching Australia in 70 or 75 days. On the 21st of August the wind blew strong from the northwest, and on the following day it increased to half a gale, with a heavy sea, the ship rolling a great deal, and frequently going from twelve to fourteen knots an hour.

FIRE AT SEA.

On the 23d the wind veered round to the southwest, but the sea continued high, and at 2 P.M. an alarm of fire was raised, and smoke was seen issuing from the fore hatch. The passengers and crew were all ordered on deck, and it was believed that all had obeyed the order; but it was afterward discovered that one of the steerage passengers, named M'Lean, was missing, and he is supposed to have been suffocated in his berth. Hopes were entertained at first of extinguishing the fire, as it did not seem to increase; but after half an hour it was found that no progress was made, notwithstanding the vast quantities of water that had been pumped into the hold. It was now apparent that the only chance was to endeavor to smother the fire. Accordingly, blankets, shawls, plaids, and old sails were used for that purpose, but all in vain. The women and children, about 60 in number, were removed to the poop. The captain hauled up the courses and put the ship before the wind, had the boats provisioned, and every thing in readiness to lower away at a moment's notice. Both passengers and crew worked all night in their endeavors to subdue the flames, the captain cheering them all the while, and never leaving the deck for a moment. His courage is described as admirable, and he never ceased to comfort the women and children by assurances that they would be all safe in the boats.

GLOOMY PROSPECT.

To add to their danger they were more than 600 miles from the nearest land, the boats could carry no more than one-half of the persons in the ship, and the sea ran so high that no boat could be launched in safety, nor live long, crowded as they must necessarily have been. Their only chance was of being picked up; but this was a forlorn hope, as they were out of the track of vessels; and those who realized the full extent of their danger felt that their destruction was simply a question of hours. Still they worked with a will, adopting every means to smother the fire. The morning of the 24th broke at length, but the sea still ran high, and the ship scudded before the wind. About noon the fore-yard came down by the run, but without injuring any one. There was evidently very little hope, and many of those on board became quite resigned to their terrible fate. The decks became very hot, and the flames were expected every moment to be seen issuing from the bows, and they were in dread of the foremast giving way, which must have precipitated their fate, as its fall must have torn up part of the deck, through which the flames would burst. At this stage the captain, purser, and Mr. Fowler threw bottles overboard, containing details of the sad catastrophe. Their rescue from impending death is thus described by Mr. Fowler:

THE RESCUE.

"The captain, chief officer, purser, doctor, Mr. Warner, the other chief cabin passenger, and myself, went into the saloon at 2 o'clock P.M. to eat something, for we were all becoming faint. We were eating what we believed to be our last meal, but we were all calm, and even cheerful, Captain Johnstone asking to be excused for the manner in which he was breaking up the preserved salmon, which, with a few biscuits, was to form our dinner; and I for appearing at dinner in such a guise, being literally covered, hands and face, with tar. At about 2.30 o'clock P.M., and when about to say 'Good-by,' in case of not meeting again before the final catastrophe, we were startled with the cry of 'A sail!' I do not know how we all tumbled on deck, but we were there in an instant. How I looked to windward, and how faint and ill I felt when I at first failed to perceive any thing but the ocean and a few black clouds just at the edge of the horizon; how we all at last saw the sail, just like a distant gull—she was coming down upon us—close by the edge of the sun's rays on the sea; how we all cheered and wept, and prayed, and laughed, and clasped each other's hands, and cheered again; how great rough fellows hugged each other and wept like children; how men, who had probably never prayed before, muttered sincere thanksgivings; and how those who had preserved the greatest indifference when death seemed so near, were now completely overcome, I can not describe. I shook hands with at least one hundred, many of them rough, illiterate men, but who had worked with a high courage in the hour of danger, and who were now as sincere in their feelings of thankfulness as the best of us. In less than half an hour from the time we first sighted her, the vessel, which proved to be the Merchantman, of and from London, with troops for Calcutta, passed close under our stern. How we cheered her, and she returned our cheer as only British soldiers and sailors can cheer. Our captain hailed through his trumpet, 'We are on fire; will you stand by us?' to which Captain Brown returned a hearty, 'Ay, ay, and send my boats to assist you.'

ALL SAFE.

"Soon two of the Merchantman's boats and three of our own were launched; but the sea was still high; and we expected every moment to see some of them swamped or dashed in pieces alongside; but thanks to ability and care of Mr. Punnell and Mr. Jones, the first and second officers of the Merchantman, and of our own officers in charge of the boats, they were conducted between the two vessels without a single accident. We first embarked the women and children, and by 8 P.M. we were all safely on board the Merchantman, our captain being the last to leave.

"On arriving on board the Merchantman, every thing had been provided by Captain Brown for the relief and comfort of the rescued passengers, in which he was assisted by Captain Dawson, commanding the troops. They had prepared hot tea and biscuits for 400. The women and children were accommodated in the cuddy and officers' rooms, and the crew and passengers mustered and told off to mess with the soldiers and sailors without the slightest confusion. The Merchantman stood by the burning ship during the night, and at about 2 A.M. the flames burst forth over the topgallant forecastle. Soon after the foremast went over the side, and in half an hour the main and mizzen masts went, and soon after she was a mass of flames. We could see her still burning until about 5 o'clock A.M., when the Merchantman having stood for Table Bay, the distance became too great for us to distinguish other than a dark cloud resting against the dim horizon, which was the last we saw of our ship. We in the first cabin saved a portion of our luggage, but the whole of the other passengers and the majority of the crew lost every thing. But we were all truly thankful for our preservation from a terrible and inevitable death, and we all feel that the finger of Providence was in it; for had the Merchantman not been obliged to put into Rio de Janeiro, in consequence of the illness of her medical officer then in charge of the troops, she could not have been so far out of her course, and in a position to rescue us."

FRANCE.

THE LATEST MIRACLE.

Chartères, in Champagne, France, has just been astonished by a new miracle. Its church contains the relics of St. Caprias, in whose honor pilgrimages have been made from time immemorial. This pilgrimage was very popular formerly, but for the last fifty years has fallen off a good deal, although St. Caprias had never been invoked in vain for the cure of the rheumatism. On the 20th ult., during the mass of the first day of the annual novena in honor of the Saint, the wife of a vine-dresser named Brion, aged about forty, went into a trance, during which she says she saw distinctly, in the midst of a light more brilliant than the sun, an old man with a venerable face (probably St. Caprias). From that moment of ecstasy, this poor woman, who for more than ten years has been completely paralyzed throughout her right side, walked with great difficulty by the aid of crutches, and had completely lost her voice, recovered her speech and the use of her limbs so perfectly that she cried out loud enough to be heard by every body in the church, "Ah! quel bonheur!" and straightway leaving the place, she walked alone, and without the aid of her crutches, to the shrine, as if she had always been well. Since that time nothing has occurred to lead one to suppose the cure is not a permanent one. Mrs. Brion now walks the streets of the village, which a few days ago were so toilsome to her, with a light step, and it is her continual joy to tell all whom she meets what she has experienced.

MORPHY'S SUCCESS IN PARIS.

In a letter to the Herald we have the following: "St. Arnaut says, in a late article, 'Paris has been pining for a hero for years past, and now we have a hero among heroes.' Paul Morphy can not go any where without being pointed at; all the shopkeepers know him and address him by name; at the theatres or opera he is stared at. Scarcely a paper appears without some information as to his movements. And yet, to my own personal knowledge, no man has ever done less to court popularity than this young hero. All that is laudatory is also honest, or he would not be continually appearing in the Charivari, Punch, etc., papers which never interfere with any man until he is universally known. Duchesses have sent after him to their chateaux, countesses and other grandes dames fête him at their hotels, and princes of royal blood invite him to their boxes at the opera. Never since the Il Puttino has chess knight-errant met such courtly favor.

"There remains but one victory for Morphy to gain—that over the German champion, Anderssen. Anderssen, however, can not leave his duties until the middle of December, and Morphy talks of quitting Europe in November. I can assure you that his departure will be universally regretted, and Morphy himself would prefer remaining through the winter. Surely his family ought to feel that a man "so gifted by high Heaven" belongs to the world rather than to himself; and as he is only just beginning life, surely three or four months will make but little difference. Should he leave for his home before spring, his relatives may rest assured that no determination on their part will be able to resist the immense pressure which will be brought to bear upon Paul Morphy to return to Europe next year."

GERMANY.

THE MILLIONAIRE AND THE DANSEUSE.

The Philadelphia Bulletin translates from a German paper the following curious story:

"A very pretty danseuse has lately created great excitement at Berlin. Mademoiselle Lilienthal made so many pirouettes one fine evening on the stage of the Theatre Royal that she turned the head of Herr Comptoir, a rich millionaire of Vienna, who was on a visit to the Prussian capital. The beautiful limbs of the fair Terpsichore touched his heart so deeply that he demanded her hand in marriage. Of course you will say that she at once accepted the offer. Not at all. She made her conditions, as follows: 1st. An apartment separate from that of her husband; 2d. A carriage and servants for herself; 3d. Fifteen thousand francs a year for her toilet; and, finally (for she calculated every thing), three hundred thousand francs in case of separation. Mr. Comptoir subscribed to these slightly unreasonable conditions, and last week all the gay world of Berlin witnessed, in the cathedral, the marriage of the millionaire with the danseuse."

RUSSIA.

FRAUDS DETECTED BY ASTRONOMY.

A St. Petersburg letter says: "The result of the calculations lately made by the well-known astronomer, Professor Struve, of the University of Dorpat, relative to the true geographical positions of St. Petersburg and Moscow, and the distance between the two capitals of the empire, is, that the actual length of the railroad is, by astronomical observations, no less than 88½ versts (about 60 miles) shorter than its nominal length of 607 versts, or, in other words, that the Government, for whose account the railroad was constructed, has had to pay about one-seventh of the value, or twelve millions of rubles, more than it ought to have paid. As the rolling stock of the St. Petersburg and Moscow Railway is furnished by an American company, who are paid for the same at so much per verst, it follows that in this quarter the Government have been paying also a most fearful overcharge. The Emperor was in the most violent state of excitement on learning the above, and gave immediate orders for the strictest investigation into the facts of the case to be made, with the view to inflict the most summary judgment on the parties inculpated in this nefarious transaction."

TURKEY.

THE "WABASH" AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

The following letter from the commander of the steam frigate Wabash, whose visit to Constantinople has occasioned so much comment, has been received at the Navy Department:

"FLAG SHIP 'WABASH,'
"CONSTANTINOPLE, October 20, 1858.

"SIR,—On my arrival at Constantinople the most lively demonstrations were manifested by the authorities. A moment after anchoring, Rear-Admiral Mehemed Pacha, our guest in the United States last winter, came on board, offering the warmest congratulations and all the conveniences of the port. The usual visits were made to the several heads of departments, and received with a degree of ceremony very unusual under similar circumstances, evincing a desire to acknowledge and reciprocate in every possible manner those civilities which were extended to their officers.

"Previous to our reception at court I was presented to the Sultan, as he was passing from the Mosque to his barge—I, in company with our Minister, Consul-General, and many others, being there for the purpose of witnessing the ceremonies. Such a presentation was entirely unprecedented, and the especial mark of favor thus bestowed can be only attributed to the kindly feelings entertained by his Majesty for the United States. Upon this occasion the Sultan expressed most cordially his pleasure at our visit, and stated that he had issued orders for every attention to be shown us, etc.; and in reply to an invitation to visit the ship, answered he would certainly do so.

"On Monday, the 18th, I, together with the officers of the ship, was presented at court, and experienced a most flattering reception.

"Yesterday the Sultan came on board. His Majesty went throughout the ship, manifesting much interest in every thing. He was pleased to compliment us upon the beauty of the model, her efficient and warlike appearance, and her admirable condition. He also reiterated his friendly feelings for our country, wished us to prolong our stay, and particularly desired that the President of the United States might be informed of his visit to the Wabash.

"I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

"E. G. F. LAVALLETTE, Flag Officer,

"Commanding Mediterranean Squadron.

"To Hon. ISAAC TOUCEY, Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C."

SIR HENRY BULWER IN LIMBO.

The London Times contains the following extract from a commercial letter dated at Constantinople: "Sir H. L. Bulwer was passing the streets at Pera on horseback, preceded by his groom, on the 20th of October, being a holy day (the nativity of Mohammed), some of the Sultan's levy driving in their carriages, the horse of the groom touched one of their horses, and the rider struck him with his whip; the groom used his whip also. Sir H. Bulwer endeavored to separate them, when the remainder of the eunuchs rushed on the embassador and struck him several blows. The embassador was arrested and taken to the police station at Pera."

JAPAN.

HOW THE EMPEROR LIVES.

A Japan letter makes Mr. Consul Harris thus describe the Emperor: "The Emperor is, as you may suppose, very rich, and yet I am positive that his table and clothing do not cost him $500 a year. Why that sum would not more than pay for the gloves of a Broadway dandy with us! You have doubtless seen the thick, soft matting with which the floors of their houses are covered. Well, the floors of the palace are covered in the same way, and this matting serves as the Emperor's bed, as well as that of the poorest house serves as the bed of his poorest subject. He stretches himself out, with a wooden pillow under his head, and sleeps a sleep rarely granted to his brother monarchs. To see a Japanese thus sleeping, with his head abruptly raised five or six inches, you would predict a stiff neck or future spinal affection as a general result; and yet there is not a more healthy people living.

"'What did the Emperor look like?' one of us asked.

"'Quite a fine looking man, with a soft voice and pleasant smile. I suppose he is some thirty-five years old. In fact, I know he is; for, as it is considered polite in Japan to ask one his age and how many children he has, I was, of course, polite. Poor fellow! He has what one of us would consider a miserable life. He does not leave the palace but once in two years; and then, as he passes through the town, every one must leave the streets and close the doors and windows of their houses. Their custom does not allow them even to look at him. This is the temporal Emperor of Jeddo, of whom I now speak; the case of the spiritual Emperor, at Miaco, is even worse, for he never leaves his palace. He is venerated so much that they can not even run the risk of his being looked upon by the crowd.'

WHAT THE JAPANESE HAVE DONE WITH OUR PRESENTS.

"Speaking of Commodore Perry, I asked him how the Japanese had treated the expensive presents which that officer had presented them, on the part of the Government, three or four years back?

"'Well, I know I am going to surprise you now,' he replied. 'You know that Commodore Perry gave them, among other things, a circular railroad, an engine and a tender, and a brass boat howitzer—one of the Dahlgren guns. They have a large house built for the safe keeping of this railroad, and every now and then take it out, lay the track, get up steam, and then away go a dozen or more high officers upon a circular pleasure trip. Japanese engineers have charge of every thing, and are never at a loss in the discharge of their duty. I suppose that they will soon have a track laid from Kanagawa to Jeddo, but I doubt if the railroad will pay in any other part of Japan; the country is too broken. As for the boat howitzer, they have had one thousand cast exactly like it, and mounted them in the forts of their different ports. And now here is something else that will surprise you. Upon both Fourths of July that I have passed here, and once upon Washington's birthday, they fired a salute of twenty-one guns with these howitzers. Mr. Heuskins and myself attended, with the American flag flying, and the people exhibited the greatest good feeling and enthusiasm. One might almost have imagined them Americans.'

"'What have they done with the electric telegraph that was presented them?' I asked.

"'Little or nothing, I think. But I am not certain. They are making astonishing headway, however, in the groundwork for future intercourse with the world.'"

CANADA.

ANOTHER LIVING CORPSE.

A Montreal paper has the following: "A few days ago a respectable man in the employment of one of the largest mercantile houses in Quebec took passage in a schooner for Baie St. Paul, on a visit to his relations. He carried with him a good stock of wearing apparel, and a check for the amount of his wages—a considerable sum. On the voyage he fell sick, and apparently died—or, what is more probable, became insensible from some narcotic administered to him. The captain of the schooner having taken possession of his clothing and money, sent two of the crew ashore to bury the dead passenger. They dug the grave, threw him in, and had begun to cover up the body, when the dead man, contrary to all law in such cases made and provided, suddenly sat bolt upright, and inquired, 'Have we arrived at last?' The amateur sextons took to their heels and fled, leaving their task but half accomplished. The corpse vindicated its vitality by cries which brought the assistance of a gentleman fishing in the neighborhood, and the half-buried victim was released from the grave, well cared for, and, as soon as it was fit to travel, forwarded home. In the mean time the false sea captain proceeded on his voyage. Arriving at St. Paul he told of the death of his passenger and his burial, and gave to his friends a portion of his worst clothes, retaining his best, and the check for his wages. When asked whether he had no checks or money, he denied it. Proceeding thence to Quebec he changed the check, invested the money in flour, and returned with flying colors, little dreaming that the buried man was following in pursuit."

MEXICO.

THE CITY ATTACKED BY THE LIBERALS.

A battle has been fought between the Liberals and Zuloaga's forces in the City of Mexico. It seems that the place was besieged by 5600 Liberals, under General Blanco, on the 14th of October, and on the following day the attack took place; but notwithstanding Zuloaga had not more than 1000 men, Blanco saw fit to withdraw after several encounters, although not thoroughly defeated. It is believed that he might have taken entire possession of the city had he been so disposed.

THANKSGIVING DAY—WAYS AND MEANS.

THANKSGIVING DAY—ARRIVAL AT THE OLD HOME.

THANKSGIVING DAY—THE DINNER.

THANKSGIVING DAY—THE DANCE.

OUR THANKSGIVING.

THE PREPARATION.

The days before "Thanksgiving,"
What busy days they were!
How Father, Mother, Jane, and I,
All labored to prepare.
The wagon-loads of fruit and grain
That poured upon us then;
The merry laughter of the maids,
The jesting of the men;
Oh! 'twas a sight to make one jump
(At least a boy like me),
Of custards, jellies, cakes, and pies,
Such quantities to see.
My Mother said, "Now, Ben, my boy"
(You see my name is Ben),
"Go search the hay-loft well for eggs,
Where hides the tufted hen;"
The turkeys, too—poor witless things!—
That gobble round our door,
Must sacrifice their tender breasts
For our "Thanksgiving" store.

THE ARRIVAL.

It came at last, the day itself,
With all its lavish cheer—
Our Pastor said it ought to be
Most cheerful of the year—
And with it came the joyful guests,
Brimful of mirth and life,
And brother Joe (who's married now
To such a handsome wife)—
And Joe shone like the sun itself;
And she, so spruce and gay,
That Father, laughing, said it seemed
Just like a wedding day.
The children, in their wild delight,
Were boisterous now and then;
But soon became more orderly
At a hint from Uncle Ben.
Cousin Maria, too, arrived
With little Sophy Lee,
Who (Mother often says) would make
Such a nice wife for me.

THE DINNER.

The dinner came, but here, alas!
I find description weak,
For words to suit those pumpkin-pies
'Twere vain indeed to seek;
And all the fair array of meats,
Of fowl, and flesh, and fish;
'Twas too much good enjoyed at once,
With nothing left to wish.
I've read of old Pythagoras,
And Epicurus, too;
I wish they had been there that day,
How they'd have stared! 'tis true:
And when the cider sparkled forth,
And all was converse gay,
We pitied those poor countries where
There's no "Thanksgiving Day."
But Mother, in her kindly heart,
Never forgets the poor;
And many an humbler board was spread
From her abundant store.

THE DANCE.

The evening twilight settled down,
More friends and neighbors came,
Chatted in groups apart, or joined
The shout-provoking game.
The pine-knots blaze upon the hearth,
The fiddlers have begun,
We danced—oh, what a real dance!
The very soul of fun!
Both old and young joined hands in turn,
Joe and his blooming wife,
The children, too, danced in between—
I tell you it was—life!
And Father danced, and Mother, too;
'Twas wonderful to see
How young they looked there opposite
To Sophy Lee—and me.
I'll wind up with the very words
I've often heard them say:
"Thank God for all his annual gifts,
And this—Thanksgiving Day!"

THE BOY-LOVE OF OLIVER WHARTON.

CHAPTER I.

I have stopped trying to count the gray hairs in my mustache now, and am in no risk of being classified under the banners of Young America. But if there be one thing which, at the calm distance of old age, I look upon with peculiar satisfaction, it is this modern day's recognition of boy-rights.

When I went to school the theory that any male person under the statute age of twenty-one years might, by the remotest possibility, be any thing but in the wrong where he differed from some one older than himself, would have been held, supposing any philosopher rash enough to propound it, as blank infidelity as well as the nebular hypothesis.

Subject to this healthful state of public sentiment, I began my career at Mounchesney Boarding-school, under the benign auspices of Dr. Aristodemus Hyde. For the six years that I spent there but three consoling ingredients entered into my cup of bitterness—the first, the consideration that constant severe friction produces condensation and callosity of surface; the second, that dear knowledge to school-boys, that I should one day be big enough "to thrash him myself;" the third, he had a daughter.

Among the boys I was called "Spider-legs," and rumored to be studying for the ministry. In neither respect were the boys altogether cherishing a fallacy: for, in the first place, I was a spindling lad of fourteen; and in the second, I had been from infancy destined to the Church, through the widely obtaining notion that feeble constitution, taciturnity, and a leaning toward weak tea, were evidences of a peculiar fitness for that profession. But however much I might be chastised by the Doctor, or satirized by my school-fellows, I never was degraded from one lofty sentiment—that of pure, whole-souled boy-love for the child of my inquisitor—Lucy Estcott Hyde, who, on going back to the old Mounchesney church-yard three days ago, my eyes read, with a libation whose vintage was nigh thirty years old,

WAS BORN ON THE 11TH OF AUGUST, 1813,
AND DIED ON THE SAME DAY OF THE SAME MONTH, 1831.
AGED JUST 18 YRS.

That was all the slab said through its moss. Clear as ever of mildew, lichen, and dust, the inscriptions on my heart told the rest.

It would have been wonderful if I had been the only one of Lucy's school-boy lovers. She was a dark, passionate brunette; a girl of that mature, voluptuous moulding, that queenly but winning carriage, that voice which is tuned to be set to such words as "I love you!"—and saying any thing else would be terrible to hear—which in a girl older than himself infallibly drive wild a half-mannish boy.

So she did have many lovers. All of our set were so. And I doubt whether her tormentingly blissful sway found any rebels until you came to the little chaps in pinafores. With a view to her complacency what martyr deeds were done by us, in the way of combing the front hair upward into a precipice painfully steep to look upon, brushing our black stockings till our calves were in a state of congestion, and stuffing the heels of our shoes with paper-wads to be nearer the light of her countenance. Not a jack-knife in school whose edge of deplorable obtusity did not tell of hard maples beautiful with her initials; not a deep pool of the little river, back of the garden, but had glassed back eyes precociously suicidal for her sake; not the tie of a neck-ribbon, not the set of a knee-buckle, not the cock of a hat, that had not been jealously rehearsed in her imaginary before it appeared in her real presence. Ah me! if to live is to be loved (and in my life I have learned that not to be loved is not to live), she lived long though she died early.

But the three adorers with whom particularly my story, and hers also, has to do, were myself, Joe Twining, and Peter Carlson.

Between Joe and myself there was all the zeal without any of the bad blood of rivalship. From the day I came to Mounchesney I had begun to love him as mine own self, to feel reciprocal attractions toward him as the complement of my own nature. For he, the strong, was as a fort to me, the puny; while the results of my patient labor were ever shared with him, the impatient and uncareful. We each knew the other loved Lucy—neither of us wished the other the shadow of a chance, but each feared his rival had one, in the poems on one side, the prowess on the other. Yet we were as generous in our antagonism as the lovers of Rose Salterne. Many a time after the lights were put out in the little dormitory we shared together did we mutually confide what we thought our successes or our désagrémens with the maiden, listen to each other with a sincere sympathy, then say, each to each, "Well, I hope I shall have her; good-night!" and go to sleep.

But if we two held our rival love, so to speak, in common, we neither of us certainly owned any communion with Lucy's third boy-lover, Peter Carlson. A more miserable and selfish oaf, so early in life, I have never met in all my experience. The form and face of the boy were repulsive at first sight. We compared him to Scarron without the soul of song; had Quilp or Quasimodo then been drawn, I don't think we should have done him much injustice in likening him to these. Over a low, beetling forehead his ragged tufts of sandy hair straggled like patches of ill-conditioned moss; beneath them his small eyes looked out like a bear's from his thicket, dull and heavy, unless they twinkled malignly at somebody's pain or the success of some mean trick. His nose was an obstinate stub, his mouth coarse, large, firm, and cruel. His arms were disproportionately long, his thick, blunt fingers always bent as if he were choking cats or distressing the hands of smaller boys; and his heavy trunk was so irrationally elevated by a pair of long, crooked legs as to suggest that the scaffolding was too high when that portion of him was put up. But all this could have been endured if his outer boy had not been a perfect type of his inner. He was a creature for whom no other purpose can be imagined than to punish so much of the world as he lived in for its sins. Incapable himself of feeling remorse, generous shame, or any of those spiritual pains which might punish a better boy, his bad heart went on unwhipped in its enjoyment of that class of cruelties which seem intangible to corporal chastisement, overturning his companion's schemes of happiness and muddying the water of our pure pleasures by disgusting suggestions, untimely rakings up of reconciled grievances, and garbled reports of what one of us had said of the other. Meanwhile he stood near under safe cover, and blinked in the only comfort that it was possible for him to feel.

Yet, would you believe it, Peter Carlson was the favorite boy of Dr. Aristodemus Hyde? The boy, who showed how benignantly the school succeeded on juvenile material—who took the medal as the best sample of Unblamable Lad, in the half-yearly exhibition—of whom the Doctor said to visitors, "Not good-looking, but fine mind; unimpeachably moral;" until visitors were confounded into the theory that it was an invariable law of nature that all good, studious boys should be ratty and mean-faced. In fine, he was the boy who had all of the holidays and ha'pence, none of the kicks and floggings.

Yet—as much as such a creature could, and in his way—he loved Lucy Hyde. That is, he wanted to possess her—to travel side by side with her adown the vale of life, pinching her and hearing her scream. The Doctor knew this, and secretly favored the boy's propensity toward his daughter; for Peter was a rich orphan—rich in his own right—in fact, it was rumored among us of Mounchesney School that there was no end to his riches, except the end this way. It might, one day, be a match, if the ugly little gold-fish was played adroitly—and then how pleasant it would be to reflect that your dear daughter was impaled on pins whose points were real diamond, in the enjoyment of all the luxuries of this life! As a Christian and a parent, he could not do less for her and answer to his own conscience.

So, when Peter had a cold of those dimensions which excused him from getting out of bed, the Doctor sent him neguses, "with Miss Hyde's compliments"—in which Miss Hyde had never twirled a spoon—plum-cakes, "made by Miss Hyde, for him expressly"—and bought at the baker's—moral books about good and ugly children, who died early of spinal complaint and sanctity, to solace his lonely hours—"Miss Hyde thought they might please him"—if she had known of them at all, she would have wished they might have poisoned him, like sumach.

There was no mistaking the way in which she felt toward him. She was a year older than he—only sixteen then, yet a perfect woman in every respect—and the cringing cruelty of his attentions were met by her as indignities. I have seen her move her seat, saying, "Wretch!" when she found herself within range of his blinking eye—and once, when, on some boy's picnic of ours, she was present, and, in a fit of grotesque knightliness, he pressed to his lips the hand that had just ladled out his glass of punch (for every body drank punch then), she snatched it away, wiped it on her little white apron, and gave him a look which, in a maiden as Andalusian in birth as she was in looks and soul, would have been pregnant with stories of a stiletto.

It was then I saw his bad face, too, and caught its look of patient vengeance; and, I tell you, it was dangerous!

CHAPTER II.

Not till one night of June—just before we were going home for the summer vacation—did I know, certainly—though, before, I had feared—which of us two, Joe or me, Lucy Hyde loved. Up to that very night I regarded the question as one of those where the odds are the difference. We, both of us, like Carlson, were only a year younger than Lucy—to both of us at the same time, in that leafy month, had come our fig-leaves of perfect manhood, in the shape of suits of thorough grown-up clothes, sent by stage from home. And our own unanimous opinion decided that we looked vastly well in them, and were, altogether, lads of person to shine in any woman's eyes.

There was half an hour between evening prayers and the bed-bell; and, having been working hard over Demosthenes Peri Stephanou ever since supper, wanted fresh air, and walked out into the play-ground. The moonlight shone bright as day, marking, in clear relief, every object, from our idle cricket-clubs, that lay upon the gravel by the door, down to the willows on the margin of the little river at the end of the garden. And those willows looked so beautifully that, although the garden was tabooed save on solemn anniversary occasions, I determined to rebel, and seek the cover of their boughs, as something in the semblance of a forest to rest in. Besides, her name was on one trunk—the clandestine result of my jack-knife—and that would be food for a melancholy pleasure.

So I stole down the bare hard-trampled play-ground and leaped the palings. For a while I strolled about in the gratification of merely doing the forbidden; and then I bent my way to the willow-clumps on the bank. I was right by their shadow, when I heard within it the sound of voices, and started back. Shrinking behind a lilac-bush, I looked, breathlessly, and saw—oh, what a sight for a poor boy-lover, loving his first love, to see, all lonely and uncomforted!

Leaning against a willow trunk sat Joe Twining, and, pressed tightly to his breast, their lips meeting passionately, reclined Lucy, more queenly beautiful for her submission to a power which was more eternal than hers.

And the boy-dream went off of my eyes quietly as a mist, leaving an awaking which was like conscious, inevitable death, turning the voluptuous moonlight from a bath of melancholy luxury into one of ice and brine. I looked at Joe's jetty waves of hair, and then wandered, with my fingers, through my own thin, light-brown locks—I saw his great, intense black eye—my own seemed to behold itself reflected, pale-blue, pensive, and near-sighted. I looked down at my own long, lank supports, and sneered as malignantly as Peter Carlson—"Spider-legs!"—then glanced at Joe, the strong-limbed, the hero-modeled, and, with rigid severity, gave him the benefit of the difference. Yea, in all things was I as cruelly just to myself upon that night as Rhadamanthus; for I had lost my boy-love—the greater part of my young soul—and despised the fool who had once so doted as to think that he could stand by such an one as Joe Twining, in the sight of a passionate woman, just knowing her first days of love and fire!

I stood and gazed upon the scene, with a delirious fascination of pain. I could not drink enough of the wakening-cup through my eyes, and I crouched quietly, wanting and waiting to hear something that might sting me. At last it came.

The lips of the two parted at length, and the low, manly voice of Joe Twining said, resolutely,

"Yes, I know, darling Lucy, we have a great while to wait—five long years it may be; for I have to go to college—to sea—or into the army: I don't yet quite know which, and I shall be nearly twenty-one before I get any profession. But if you will wait for me, I can bear any thing, fight any thing. God bless you, Lucy! Will you?"

"Yes, forever!" spoke the girl's voice passionately. "But when you are gone—those months, those years—what shall I do? My mother is dead—there is no one to reason with me, to advise me, and I shall be left all alone in my shame!"

Shame! what shame? I almost uttered these words aloud, and half darted from my cover. Lucy was now near eighteen, Joe was still nearer seventeen, and I, the bodily immature boy yet in thought the man, knew enough of young blood to be sure that it was warm. And could they—could they—have sinned? He, my almost brother against her—she, my deified love against herself? The agony of that suspicion of her was so much worse than my trampled-out love that I banished it instantly with the words, "God can not let it be!" But what shame? The question was sealed, labeled, filed away to be answered afterward.

The retiring bell must have sounded loud enough for us to hear it from the house, but if it did, we did not notice it; being all of us too much occupied then in what were really to each of us, though in our different ways, the decisive concerns of a lifetime. I was gathering myself up to crush out, or to endure—they were busy with the hope of perpetuating, love.

There came a little creak as of a gate unlocked and swinging back, and of a sudden in our sight stood Dr. Aristodemus Hyde. It was not for me he was looking. I need not have shrunk into deeper shadow to avoid discovery; for he passed me unseen or unnoticed, and walked straight and savagely on toward the lovers. They both leaped up, and stood, as befitted their strong natures, unbending before him.

"A beautiful piece of business, Miss! beautiful, I do declare! And very nice for you, my young master! You both probably know that it is not my habit to forget. No! nor shall I. And that Mister Joseph Twining was out in the garden I flogged three boys last week for entering—with my very well-behaved young lady, and alone at ten o'clock at night—will be a very easy and pretty thing to be remembered—remembered! Go to your room, Sir! Come with me, Miss!

This last was spoken tigerishly, and might have fired a lad less prominent in the muscular virtues of young manhood than Joe Twining. He deliberately put his arm around the waist of the young girl and said, quietly,

"I shall do no such thing!"

For a moment the Doctor stood passive. An exigency of that kind—an exigency of revolutionary boyhood—was hitherto unfamiliar to him. Theory, theologic, æsthetic, and governmental, were with him, but fact was decidedly against him.

He met the fact by rushing at Joe Twining, seizing him by the collar as he would have done two years before, and bringing his hand toward the left ear of that young gentleman.

Not quite, though—for Joe was ready with another fact—and before I could collect my senses the Doctor was lying at his feet, unable, as they say, in the polite circles of P. R., to come to time. And then came out the noble nature of the boy, for he knelt down over the prostrate form of his tyrant and said, as he loosed his stock,

"Forgive me! God forgive me, and you, Lucy, for he was your father!"

On the morrow Joe Twining was expelled, with an attempt at making him desperately ignominious, such as only those hoary wretches ever venture, who, from willfully perverse education or unconvertibly bad nature, love to damn the spirit that resists them, by setting on him a canker spot that may eat into all the robustest efforts of an after lifetime. Such there were in my day in schools and colleges. I pity them, wheresoever at this day they survive.

Do not distrust my motive. I am paying up no old scores, for I was not expelled from either school or college.

What passed between Joe and Lucy Hyde I do not know. I only am aware that our parting—his and mine—was unchilled by the breath of any memory of that night-scene in the garden. I never hinted my knowledge of it—of that, his crowning success in our rivalry, he, for the first time in our friendship, made no confidant of me, sparing my pain most brotherly.

And after that, orphaned of his strong arm and stronger affection, I went home for the hot weather holidays.

CHAPTER III.

Early in August I came back to Mounchesney. The theory of that school was to make the year's dog-days and ours commence as near as possible together. For that a boy might have health to look after, at that day would have been as absurd a paradox as the assertion that he had rights.

So I returned into the austere desk-rows and the hot blank play-ground, to find no character there of any prominence save that afflictive dispensation of mysterious Providence, the oaf, Peter Carlson. I had lost my half-soul on that night of June—when Joe was expelled, I parted with most of the rest of it—and it did not seem to anger the remainder in the least, when our Quilp hailed me with a boisterous slap on the shoulder, and made overtures toward familiarity.

For nearly a week I did not see Lucy Hyde. She came no longer, as usual, to any of our rude boarding-school meals with us, and her light foot never sounded on the steps up to her father's pinnacle of work-hour observation. But at last I caught sight of her at her window.

Changed—oh! changed, by tears and thought, so that I trembled with pain.

And in our community it was evident that something novel was brewing. "Some portent hung on the wings of the to-come." For every now and then my little next neighbor in the desks would nudge me and say, "Look at that ape!" and invariably, when I looked, I beheld Peter Carlson in deep communication with the Doctor, bending beside him on the rostrum, over a classic which they made believe decipher, while they were evidently concerned in something else.

There came a morning when all this reached its end. I look back to that morning as one of the way-marks of my life—a time when I was, perhaps, in as much agony as it is possible for me ever to suffer.

The gardener, going out early to the banks of the river with his pruning-shears, discovered it. It began to be rumored before breakfast among the boys, and we grew pale; then said, "No, it is a cheat!" But, being only the subject of whisper at the table, we trembled and left our small dole half touched. It was confirmed when we met in the school-room, and that subordinate said, solemnly with a voice which reverence curtailed of its fees, etc.:

"Boys, Miss Hyde was found drowned this morning in the river behind the garden."

The corner-lines of the gray school-room walls seemed to wave and run spirally like serpents. The floor rocked under me, and I grasped the bench. Yet I did not grow faint. Exigencies make natures look more firm. I sprung from my bench, and in an instant was past the teacher and out of the room. Then—before I knew it—over the garden palisades and into the bank of the stream.

The old man, paralyzed from his wonted stern mien, had yet given no orders; and the gardener had the usual dread of the lower classes of touching a drowned person till the officer came. So the boy there still, where the swift rush of the current had washed her on shore.

Floating, fathoming, in a black, treacherous pool, rocked by the curls of its eddy, with her glorious black hair tangled in the willow roots, Lucy Hyde was dreadful in death. The last fiery agony had died utterly away from her lips, and they were dark as a sparkless coal next to their beloved. Even a smile was on her mute face, as if she saw him beckoning whither she had gone, and her eyes were closed, their long fair lashes drooping quietly as in sweet dreams of him. And over her bosom were crossed the marble-white round arms that seemed to fold him.

It was not I that they seemed to fold! Yet, forgetting all earthly visibility—calling its clamor in the one cry of torture that went up out of my soul —I knelt on the dripping bank, and, with one hand around a willow, bent and drew her gently up upon the land. Nor took I from my only beloved in death that blessed watch, for another hour, my lips denied my bo-heart in life; and, in an agony like her hand and I, sat down upon the roots beside her, whispering,

"Would to God—would to God I had died for thee!"

CHAPTER IV.

It was the day after her funeral—that pageant of dreary pain, of which I remember nothing save that I walked in the crowd, that miserable one the deepest stricken of all, yet who has no right to give vent to signs of his mourning, and that when the clods fell echoing I well-nigh leaped in with them—that the Doctor, one of school-days, called me into his study. Not deigning to ask pity, or let sorrow soften his sternness—yet for that all the more pitiable—he did not act icily with me and hold out to me in his hand a letter, post-marked Springfield, the place where Joe Twining lived.

"Read that," said he.

I took it from him, opened it hurriedly, and, in Twining's hand, found the following words:

"SIR—I have been a villain. It is I who brought the darkest upon your child's head, to which she has died. She ended with her own life. I shall have fled—you will not find me; but, before I go, my conscience goads me to confess all.

I stood speechless for a moment, and then read it over once more, the desperate hope of finding some clew which might prove it an imposture. But no; his very hand and signature, to the last curve of the y's and g's.

I looked, maddened, into the Doctor's face. Whether it was bad, or the effect of the letter that melted him, I know not; but, like a great hill-torrent fired by the sudden thaw, the hard, cold fountains of his deep were broken up, and he uttered the fierce and bitter cry,

"Where is he? Where shall I find him? Tell me! Before God, tell me! Do you know?"

His very fury stilled me. I checked myself, and answered,

"No! As God lives, I do not! But, from the day, every force of my nature—every power of my mind—all the patience of my soul shall be given by God I swear it!—to this one end, of hunting him through the world! For your broken-hearted daughter was my life!"

If man at all, I was a very young one. But man was strong in purpose. And that night, by the willows where I had found Lucy Hyde in her beauty's arms—under the very tree I had carved with her name, on the bank whence she had leaped from shame into the fatal silence, unreproached and made fiercely resolute by all these associations of dread memory—I joined hands with Peter Coffson, reconciled to him by his unity with me in purpose; and we both called the Great Avenger to witness that some one, some shadow—some power or ill, we would be quits with him who had done Lucy Hyde her wrong.

Like him I was an orphan; yet, unlike him, not rich. The little patrimony that my father, dying in his early manhood, left me was not quite sufficient to keep me as a gentleman's son. So that my guardian was not liberal enough to me to spend as much of it as could be spent at a boarding-school. I now wrote to him and told him that I was ready for college, but that, my health being broken down, I should like to travel a year first; and would be obliged to him if he would consent to honor my drafts upon him from the various parts of the country through which I might journey.

He was an easy man, with plenty to attend to in his own affairs, and the next mail brought his letter of assent to all my plans. The next step was to sit down by the side of Carlson, write and exchange with him copies of our vow for tokens of our earnestness; then spend a day with my elder brother and sister, in an adjoining town; bid them good-by, and set off on my mission of retribution.

The day before my starting saw me seventeen. Do you think it incredible that one so young should take such terrible resolve, and set forth on it so calmly? Remember, then, that I had lived all my life in the nurturing atmosphere of earnest thought, and think how the last few days since I had known her wrongs are of that sort which ripen manhood in a night.

I went first to Springfield, where lived the family of Joseph Twining. Of old I had enjoyed the hospitalities of their table. To learn where to now would have been to betray them; so I stopped at a small Inn, and called on them set forth on it with a pose of making probing inquiries of their sorrowful neighbors. Evidently they knew nothing of his guilt. They were in a great distress at his departure, which took place almost instantly on his receipt of Lucy's note, and which he had abandoned him, they said; and he had gone off one morning, talking wildly of going into the army. It was very kind—very brotherly for the two such acts as interest in looking for him. If I found him, would I bring him back? The night of his flight another wrung my heart; I almost promised that I would. Then Lay, with a sigh, turned from the pool, as in the garden, lay before me, and I extended my self.

Oh, it would take days to tell you how I followed that man! Often tired and sick—sometimes hoping to meet him week in a large town, out of the reach of all help were I to be dying—sometimes marry sheltered, for want of the means to travel, and even then, as I grew well, relentless, unmitigated.

Ever and anon, I received letters from my guardian, my brother, and my sister, asking the cause of my long wandering; begging me to return and take some steps in my profession. But I answered them evasively, and kept on.

I had learned from what Joseph Twining entered the army. Once I saw his name gazetted as the brave leader of a little band against a great force of Seminole Indians in Florida. "Cap'ain" before it; and if the detailed report of his prowess were true, he had won more than that title. I followed him to the spot of encampment; he had been ordered elsewhere a month before. Again I heard of him as the leader of a force we men from the scaling-ladder to the Mississippi border. Now nobody of that set did or dares me back remorsaful from his trail. He had saved three. How dare he claim safeguard from that, when he had slain one? and that, O God! how much to me!

At last the terrible slaughter in the everglades of Florida began to call for vengeance, and the public mind was agitated every where with the necessity of sending our countrymen to those fatal, treacherous and bottomless, tangled morasses. Volunteers flocked to the Gulf—where the danger was most imminent, as he always had. Be heard of it, and pursued him.

CHAPTER V.

It the wilds midway between Fort King and the Withlacoochee River I heard, at last, that Twining and his men had encamped, for a week, on a companion but my ride—no guide but a foot-path —"Journey-cake" to eat. I had come upon it in that veriest jungle that I stepped, one nightfall, to the fire-ring around the funereal moss as my gala-couch, to celebrate my twenty-first birth-day with a revival of my vow of retribution—though, in all the years since I had made it, my resolve had not waxed old.

There were perhaps ten persons gathered about on that occasion with me. To rest, to cook, to sleep, like myself, they had laid themselves down in the wilderness, a day's ride or two from Seminoles to which, not the fear, though often the tomahawk, of the savage was a care. Yet our camp-fire was small, and of the driest sticks that the hammocks knows smoke as a dog does the buck, and he is not to be betrayed to invite, perhaps, the foe. Nor was may say of entertaining him when he has come unbidden. We stupped our venison; then began to talk, which, with cards, was to be our pastime till we set our guard and slept.

And we talk was of Joseph Twining.

"Where to find him?" answered an old hunter, in the tongue-and-speech speech of woodmen, evil or white. "Ax the gal-lant Seminoles who will never bloody their mocassins again, though they were the last Injun devils had! They'll tell you what that comes and goes. Ask the deer and the swamp-fox. Not me; I don't know. He's here, and there, and every where—all to once. Them as don't like the critters finds him quick enough—that's sartain."

"Is he brave?"

"I reckon you sin't long in the glades—to you?"

"He is, then? I am glad to hear it. I hope to see him."

We fell into the first watch. They fell on myself and a tall Spaniard, who had been sitting moodily by the fire—hitherto, I had noticed, in no conversation. The pleasure of keeping vigil with this taciturn person was increased by the discovery that he understood English, and demonstrated that he was about to be reassured, and that night felt it necessary to sleep with one eye.

"Good-night, Prophet Antonio," said the hunter who had talked to me of Joseph Twining. "Let me know if you die before them out-glades [wickedly], stranger; bury him decently if he cats stick!" After which salty jest and his companions drew their blankets up to their eyebrows and went to sleep.

Antonio and I fresh primed our locks, laid our knives on the ground beside us, and drew our legs under our blankets. We sat cross-legged the live oak under which we had stopped; I mounted guard on a gray, mossy stone, about ten yards off from him—a long distance for talking; but neither he nor I were in that mood—so it was near enough.

In that death-like silence of the glade—death-like beyond tones, or any solitary place but a dead heart—the whole bitter past came trooping by me, with open record in its hands; and I read, and read, and read; and the one hurt ineffaceable sentence was,

"I shall be left all alone in my shame!"

"No, Lucy, no!" I groaned through my tightshut teeth. "Not alone; for I will be with you—yes, evermore, till I slay it not! 'Till then, help me God, I journey and endure!"

Thinking such thoughts, I sat, an absorbed and brooding thread-bare mind. Lay I can not tell. The last coals of the camp-fire had burned out, and the full moon, just rising, was beginning to flood all those pathless places with silver, when I lifted my head from its moody dejection and looked across to the opposite stone.

Good God! there sat the Spaniard, still as ever, but with Lucy's picture in his breast, and a fixed, steady stream of the life-blood pouring from his neck! I leaped up, but a grip like eagle talons seized my throat from behind and I saw a long, thin hunting-knife gleam right over my breast. Quick, but deep-hilted to my heart, and then I felt the clutch on my windpipe relaxed. I sprang to my feet, turned, and there stood a fiendish savage, in the wild dress of Seminole half crushed in the circle-like grasp of a tall white man braced against his back. The hunter's hands—one clutching three toward his new enemy—thrusting hindward over his shoulder—and plain, in that moonlight as almost daylight, I saw the keen point pierce my preserver's blanket, and doubtless—O God, to think it—his heart. Then I saw the Indian's head cocked close by the Indian's ear, the hammer fell, and with the report and a wild beast shriek ended all the devilry he could do in this world.

My saviour stepped over the prostrate carcass of the warrior, and coolly stood admiring the mistake of the new fully wakened throng, who rushed to meet him with bare murmured plaudits that must have been like music.

And what was the name they cried?

Antonio Twining!

No! I did not dream. For one moment the awful sense of sudden death but a few rounds past impending, the gratitude that I owed for its averting, and to his, kept me dumb-stricken.

Then I sprang to my weapons, and standing forth before them all, and close in front of him, asked calmly,

"Joseph Twining, do you know me?"

The soldier faced me intently for an instant, and then with a shout of joy sprang to catch me in his arms, crying,

"Bless God for the sight! My dear Oliver Wharton!"

It stopped back a pace or two, muttering his head in a maze.

"One moment—hear me, Joseph Twining. I am a murderer and have come to slay a murderer. I frankly acknowledge I would have killed as I might the bear or the wolf that crossed me.

"You did save me a life. We are this night made mutual debtors. But the balance is an unequal one. I have come to Florida to-day and to day these four years to strike that balance with him who brought shame and death to Lucy Hyde! Now, I am not set is to oblige me to you. But I, her sworn avenger—you as a soldier bearing the sword of justice—have no choice. We are both to wipe out the old darkened score. The life you have saved is to a drop to the ocean. I offer you in return the contents of mine!"

Doubtless he did not. For though at her name the strong man's head covered his face with his hands as one who walks again in sleep through the passages of some old remembered home, and then turned to the rest of my words with the same perplexed astonishment that was on the faces of those around him. Ye solve his doubt, I came closer and whispered in his ear,

"Remember who drove Lucy Hyde to the river —remember Seminole Jack!"

In a moment, all look of vague wonder vanished from his face, and a fiend-like eye flashed like a lion's, and with his hand trembling on the hilt of his bowie-knife, he cried out,

"Speak that word again of her, and, by the God who hears me, were you ten times my brother, I'll be your dead set!"

In my turn I stood wonder-stricken. He kept on.

"Look you, Oliver Wharton. For the four years since her paroxysm left the earth this was too keen a blade for me to entrust over me, my angel, in the heaven where she sits, her eyes clear from all sorrow. The knowledge that she was there looking, made all life as one long penance to me—as the unconquerable.

"In the light she has given me tireless heart and nerve, in temptation many a time has she saved me from sinning against her memory. And to-night, while I was ransoming that life of mine—I sprang you to insult her holy name—I should have been struck to the heart by that! Well! Let who swelters at the stone yonder but for her presence, standing as even between me and death—I say, that, though your words have shown you too low to touch it, and see what she has done for me—"

He stood, passionate fingers he drew from his breast a small gold locket, suspended about his neck from a strong steel chain, and put it in my hand.

O Heaven! To see that face again after all these years! It could endure but one glance at it, and turning it around, save in the thick plate which protected it at the back the dent of the Seminole's knife piercing through clear to the ivory!

I handed it back to him, and then, with an effort to be calm, said,

"It is true, Joseph Twining; but if the wronged, the murdered one is more than on earth, all you good for ill, it is not the province of her avenger to pass by the sin. I have looked; will you also?"

So speaking, I drew from my breast the only remembrancer of Lucy Hyde I had ever owned. Not her angel's face of loving—no! but that packet which for four years had been burning against my heart to keep it red hot till its mission was accomplished. It contained the two papers; that letter from Joe Twining which her father had put into my hand the day after the funeral, and Peter Carlson's copy of our oath of retribution. I held them out to Twining, and said, "Read!"

The moon was not bright enough for the deciphering of those long clotted and folded characters, so again we, in a little fire of dry sticks, broke which he and I knelt down.

His eye first fell upon Peter Carlson's paper, and he read it eagerly, but with the same look of wonder that had met my former words.

"Peter Carlson!" he cried, at last, growing, growing, as he read in silence, he drank in his own letter down to the last word.

For a moment I thought the strong man was about to real and fall. Then he sprang, like a wounded lion in his fell, and, in a scream that, forgetting all warrior caution, rent the woods, "God damn him! Oh! could even that fiend have held mercy while I was by? Was I to die also?"

We bent our heads close together at the fire, and, laughing with a force which delivered almost too much to guide the eye, he showed me the stamp on the corner, first of one paper, then of the other, which I had not noticed before, and knew but Peter Carson had ever used paper of that stamp in all the island!

And I had never noticed it before.

Wildening as a lightning-bolt, but as dazzling the clear, the truth fell upon my soul. Who had been the demoniac author of this four-years' lie, that, starting with a forged letter, prevented, prayed and wandering—who the malignant rival—the forger—the blight of Joe Twining's honor—my friend's enemy—the thing to be hunted, strengthened—the ever-present nightmare of an old father's last heart—the blackener of the dead girl's stainless remembrance. I knew it all.

I looked one solemn question.

"Joseph Twining, the wrong which I have done you is greater than I dare ask you to forgive. May all, and He, that can be taken for into His Heaven, forgive it me. But tell me one thing. I once heard her call you 'brother.' Did you know it—You will leave me all alone in my shame!" What shame?"

"The shame of hearing that fiend's constant insulting advances, sanctioned by her father. Did a day before the end, that I left her, and myself, she wrote to me, saying, 'On the morrow I must answer in, and my father swears it shall be so.' Yes." I do not know. If you can not come, there is no way to help it. We shall surely marry on such a day."

And whether that letter was intercepted, delayed on the road, miscarried, or what, I can not tell. It was concluded but that I had, all covered with post-marks and directions, on the front, "Lucy Hyde, Miss Carlson's Seminary, Springfield."

But should my justice sleep? Her eyes, purged in that night of horrors, amidst death and revelation, unsealed from their long, heavy mourning-wood and mountains, over streams and valleys, looked down upon Carlson.

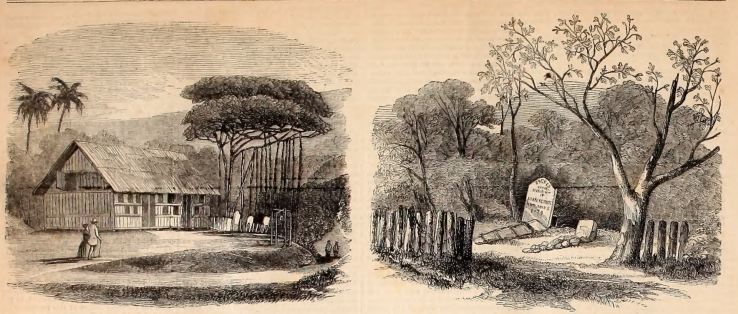
"Let me go alone," were the words I spoke to Joe Twining. "Honor, your country, her memory, require that you should not. I am not a man's life. I am not wanted in the field or the fort. Let my brief days of unrelieved sundering be consecrated to striking home a truth as I would have done the lie. My retribution, though you stay, shall be mine. Let me be the knowledge of the truth we are one."

We parted from him when I had come to stay in tears and fervent blessing.

And it was on a clear October morning that I entered Mobile harbor, from which I should travel straight to my victim's house. My knife was sharp, my pistol primed, my soul resolute.

The negro who opened the door said his master was at home. Would I walk up into his office? "Yes," I replied, and followed the servant, who ushered me into the library.

A grown man—I had taken his account with the dead into His hands—and Lucy Hyde was avenged.



THE ORPHAN'S DREAM.

We laid him, weeping, on his couch,
But when he slept he smiled,
And when he woke he thought
Looked sweetly on her child;
His life was dear to her
His little hands had striven
In vain to deck that mournful robe
That floated back to heaven.

"Oh! will she never come again?"
He sobbed at twilight hour—
"Then let me sleep and dream once more,
For then we are not parted."

In vain we told him she had fled
Away from worldly care,
And, pointing to the sunny skies,
Had now her dwelling there;
His pallid cheek still paler grew,
His eye no more smiled beaming,
But when our little orphan smiled,
'Twas then he was dreaming.

Once more we saw the angel come,
We saw, half broken-hearted,
His hands he had clutched the snow-white robe—
They never more were parted.

CHURCH ON PITCAIRN'S ISLAND. GRAVE OF ADAMS, THE MUTINEER.

A ROMANCE OF SHIPWRECK.

THE ship Wild Wave, Captain J. N. Knowles, left San Francisco on the 9th of February last, bound for Valparaiso. On the 5th of March, at 11½ A.M., she was lost on the Island of Jeno, seventy-five miles northwest of Pitcairn's Island. The wreck occurring in the daytime, the crew of the ship was saved, as also the provisions, and gold to the amount of fifty thousand dollars, which last the captain prudently landed without the knowledge of his crew. The true seaman is honest and reliable; but the "beach-combers," who chiefly man the ships now trading in the Pacific, are a set to whom no species of crime comes amiss, and who have not the clearest ideas as to the rights of property, especially in cases of shipwreck.

After remaining on the Island of Jeno for ten days, Captain Knowles started in one of his boats for Pitcairn's Island, in the expectation of there obtaining relief from the colony founded by the mutineers of the Bounty. He did not know that the entire colony had been transported three years ago, by the British Government, to Van Diemen's Land. He found the island deserted; and was, further, so unfortunate as to lose his boat in the surf, while effecting a landing on the harborless shores. Here, then, were four men, Captain Knowles, his mate, Mr. J. F. Bartlett, and two seamen, thrown upon their own resources, upon an island generally known to be deserted, and not lying in the track of vessels in any usual trade. Happily they found among the articles left on the island by the old residents, tar, oakum, sail-cloth, and some tools. With these aids they set about the construction of a boat; cutting down trees, shaping planks by hand, putting in tree-nails or wooden bolts where nails were lacking, and in other ways making the best of their circumstances.

The vessel—a rude, open boat—was built, and they started for Tahiti, a distance of nearly fifteen hundred miles. The prevailing winds, however, were against them; in their rockle-shell, with only one square sail, they could not beat to windward; and so they finally shaped a course for Nukahiva, one of the Marquesas group, and noted as the scene of Herman Melville's adventures, distant also over thirteen hundred miles from their starting-place. The long and venturesome voyage was fortunately accomplished; and on their arrival they were taken on board the United States sloop-of-war Vandalia, just sailing for the Society Islands. Thence the captain and his well-preserved gold returned to San Francisco in a French vessel of war, while the Vandalia sailed to the rescue of the balance of the crew left on Jeno.

Captain Knowles deserves much credit for his perseverance and energy under circumstances which would tempt most men to inaction. No doubt he will find his reward among American ship-owners.

In the largest of our illustrations our artist has depicted the scene of the brave crew starting in their rough boat, through the surf, on their voyage of nearly fifteen hundred miles over a trackless ocean.

Our other illustrations represent scenes on the now deserted isle; concerning whose romantic history a few words will not be amiss here. It is a volcanic isle, with fertile soil, but not overabundantly watered; situated in lat. 25° S., and long. 130° W., to the southeast of the Society group; only seven miles in circumference, and with an almost inaccessible shore. It was seen and named by Carteret in 1767, again seen by Cook in 1773; but owes its chief interest to the fact of its colonization by a portion of the mutineers of the British ship Bounty, in 1790. Of these ill-fated men a part remained in Tahiti; but nine British sailors, together with six Tahitian men and twelve women, set out in the Bounty and finally reached this then scarcely known isle, where their leader, Christian, persuaded them to destroy the vessel and settle down. The sailors were a vicious set. In ten years all but one had died violent deaths, and there remained only Adams, one of the very worst characters of the nine, together with the women and nineteen children. When he found himself alone Adams took thought of his position, and at last thoroughly reformed. A Bible and an Episcopal prayer-book not only led him to the truth, but enabled him to instruct the women and children in "these things necessary for their salvation." So great was his influence that, where once all had been drunken violence, there presently reigned industry and morality. The small space of arable land was laid out and planted; a church was built, where the veteran mutineer humbly proclaimed the Gospel; and when, in 1814, after a lapse of thirty-four years, a ship at length, by accident, touched at the lost isle, the astonished captain was hailed in good English by a tawny descendant of old Lieutenant Christian (named, to commemorate his birth-day, Thursday October Christian), and found a people simple and peaceful in their habits, contentedly practicing the manners and customs of an English country hamlet, in this out-of-the-way nook of the world.

In 1825 Captain Beechey found on the island 66 persons. In 1831 the colony, then numbering 87 persons, was removed to Tahiti at the instigation of some over-benevolent individual, who feared that the small isle would not support so many. But having lost twelve of their number by sickness, the balance gladly returned to their old home. In 1829 John Adams, the sole survivor of the mutineers, died. The wooden tablet above our his grave in our illustration, bears the words, "Sacred to the Memory of John Adams. Died March 5, 1829." This tablet was formerly put into its place only when ships visited the island. It is now permanently placed. In the grave to the right lies the wife of Adams's son, George.

THE SHIPWRECKED CREW, OUTWARD-BOUND FROM PITCAIRN'S ISLAND, COMING THROUGH THE SURF.

In 1852 the island had 21 families, making altogether 170 souls: 82 males, and 88 females. At that time there were but two survivors of the first generation born on the island. Several strangers succeeded at different times in locating themselves in the colony. Among these the most remarkable was the Baron de Thierry, who afterward made himself King of the Marquesas, and latterly abandoned savage life and taught music in California.

In 1855 the entire colony was removed at the expense of the British Government to a spot of land granted them in a fertile valley of Van Diemen's Land; and the island is once more deserted.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

BOOK XI.—CHAPTER I.

"The course of true love never does run smooth!" May it not be because where there are no obstacles, there are no tests to the truth of Love? Where the course is smooth, the stream is crowded with pleasure-boats. Where the wave swells, and the shoals threaten, and the sky lowers, the pleasure-boats have gone back into harbor. Ships fitted for rough weather are those built and stored for long voyage.

I pass over the joyous meeting between Waife and Sophy. I pass over George's account to his fair cousin of the scene he and Hartopp had witnessed, in which Waife's innocence had been manifested, and his reasons for accepting the penalties of guilt had been explained. The first few agitated days following Waife's return have rolled away. He is resettled in the cottage from which he had fled; he refuses, as before, to take up his abode at Lady Montfort's house. But Sophy has been almost constantly his companion, and Lady Montfort herself has spent hours with him each day—sometimes in his rustic parlor, sometimes in the small garden-plot round his cottage, to which his rambles are confined. George has gone back to his home and duties at Humberston, promising very soon to revisit his old friend and discuss future plans.

The scholar, though with a sharp pang, conceding to Waife that all attempt publicly to clear his good name at the cost of reversing the sacrifice he had made, must be forborne, could not, however, be induced to pledge himself to unconditional silence. George felt that there were at least some others to whom the knowledge of Waife's innocence was imperatively due.

Waife is seated by his open window. It is noon; there is sunshine in the pale blue skies—an unusual softness in the wintry air. His Bible lies on the table beside him. He has just set his mark in the page, and reverently closed the Book. He is alone. Lady Montfort—who, since her return from Fawley, has been suffering from a kind of hectic fever, accompanied by a languor that made even the walk to Waife's cottage a fatigue, which the sweetness of her kindly nature enabled her to overcome, and would not permit her to confess—has been so much worse that morning as to be unable to leave her room. Sophy has gone to see her. Waife is now leaning his face upon his hand, and that face is sadder and more disquieted than it had been, perhaps, in all his wanderings. His darling Sophy is evidently unhappy. Her sorrow had not been visible during the first two or three days of his return, chased away by the joy of seeing him—the excitement of tender reproach and question—of tears that seemed as joyous as the silvery laugh which responded to the gayety that sported round the depth of feeling with which he himself beheld her once more clinging to his side, or seated, with upward loving eyes, on the footstool by his knees. Even at the first look, however, he had found her altered; her cheek was thinner, her color paled. That might be from fretting for him. She would be herself again, now that her tender anxiety was relieved. But she did not become herself again. The arch and playful Sophy he had left was gone, as if never to return. He marked that her step, once so bounding, had become slow and spiritless. Often when she sate near him, seemingly reading or at her work, he noticed that her eyes were not on the page—that the work stopped abruptly in listless hands; and then he would hear her sigh—a heavy but short impatient sigh! No mistaking that sigh by those who have studied grief: Whether in maid or man, in young or old, in the gentle Sophy, so new to life, or in the haughty Darrell, weary of the world, and shrinking from its honors, that sigh had the same character, a like symptom of a malady in common: the same effort to free the heart from an oppressive load; the same token of a sharp and rankling remembrance lodged deep in that finest nerve-work of being, which no anodyne can reach—a pain that comes without apparent cause, and is sought to be expelled without conscious effort.

The old man feared at first that she might, by some means or other, in his absence, have become apprised of the brand on his own name, the verdict that had blackened his repute, the sentence that had hurled him from his native sphere; or that, as her reason had insensibly matured, she, herself, reflecting on all the mystery that surrounded him—his incognitos, his hidings, the incongruity between his social grade and his education or bearing, and his repeated acknowledgments that there were charges against him which compelled him to concealment, and from which he could not be cleared on earth; that she, reflecting on all these evidences to his disfavor, had either secretly admitted into her breast a conviction of his guilt, or that, as she grew up to woman, she had felt, through him, the disgrace entailed upon herself. Or if such were not the cause of her sadness, had she learned more of her father's evil courses; had any emissary of Jasper's worked upon her sensibilities or her fears? No, that could not be the case, since whatever the grounds upon which Jasper had conjectured that Sophy was with Lady Montfort, the accuracy of his conjectures had evidently been doubted by Jasper himself; or why so earnestly have questioned Waife? Had she learned that she was the grandchild and natural heiress of a man wealthy and renowned—a chief among the chiefs of England—who rejected her with disdain? Was she pining for true position? or mortified by the contempt of a kinsman, whose rank so contrasted the vagrancy of the grandsire by whom alone she was acknowledged?

Tormented by these doubts, he was unable to solve them by such guarded and delicate questions as he addressed to Sophy herself. For she, when he falteringly asked what ailed his darling, would start, brighten up for the moment, answer—"Nothing, now that he had come back;" kiss his forehead, play with Sir Isaac, and then manage furtively to glide away.

But the day before that in which we now see him alone, he had asked her abruptly, "if, during his absence, any one besides George Morley had visited at Lady Montfort's—any one whom she had seen?" And Sophy's cheek had as suddenly become crimson, then deadly pale; and first she said "No," and then "Yes;" and after a pause, looking away from him, she added—"The young gentleman who—who helped us to buy Sir Isaac, he has visited Lady Montfort—related to some dear friend of hers."

"What, the painter?"

"No—the other, with the dark eyes."

"Haughton!" said Waife, with an expression of great pain in his face.

"Yes—Mr. Haughton; but he has not been here a long, long time. He will not come again, I believe."

Her voice quivered, despite herself, at the last words, and she began to bustle about the room—filled Waife's pipe, thrust it into his hands with a laugh, the false mirth of which went to his very heart, and then stepped from the open window into the little garden, and began to sing one of Waife's favorite simple old Border songs; but before she got through the first line the song ceased, and she was as lost to sight as a ring-dove, whose note comes and goes so quickly among the impenetrable coverts.

But Waife had heard enough to justify profound alarm for Sophy's peace of mind, and to waken in his own heart some of its most painful associations. The reader, who knows the wrong inflicted on William Losely by Lionel Haughton's father—a wrong which had led to all poor Willy's subsequent misfortunes—may conceive that the very name of Haughton was wounding to his ear; and when, in his brief, sole, and bitter interview with Darrell, the latter had dropped out that Lionel Haughton, however distant of kin, would be a more grateful heir than the grandchild of a convicted felon—if Willy's sweet nature could have admitted a momentary hate—it would have been for the thus vaunted son of the man who had stripped him of the modest all which would perhaps have saved his own child from the robber's guilt, and himself from the robber's doom. Long since, therefore, the reader will have comprehended why, when Waife came to meet Sophy at the river-side, and learned at the inn on its margin that the name of her younger companion was Lionel Haughton—why, I say, he had so morosely parted from the boy, and so imperiously bade Sophy to dismiss all thought of meeting "the pretty young gentleman" again.

And now again this very Lionel Haughton to have stolen into the retreat in which poor Waife had deemed he left his treasure so secure! Was it for this he had fled from her? Did he return to find her youth blighted, her affections robbed from him, by the son of Charles Haughton? The father had despoiled his manhood of independence; must it be the son who despoiled his age of its only solace? Grant even that Lionel was worthy of Sophy—grant that she had been loyally wooed—must not that attachment be fruitless—be fatal? If Lionel were really now adopted by Darrell, Waife knew human nature too well to believe that Darrell would complacently hear Lionel ask a wife in her whose claim to his lineage had so galled and incensed him. It was while plunged in these torturing reflections that Lady Montfort (not many minutes after Sophy's song had ceased and her form vanished) had come to visit him, and he at once accosted her with agitated inquiries—"When had Mr. Haughton first presented himself?—how often had he seen Sophy?—what had passed between them?—did not Lady Montfort see that his darling's heart was breaking?"

But he stopped as suddenly as he had rushed into this thorny maze of questions; for, looking imploringly into Caroline Montfort's face, he saw there more settled signs of a breaking heart than Sophy had yet betrayed, despite her paleness and her sighs. Sad, indeed, the change in her countenance since he had left the place months ago, though Waife, absorbed in Sophy, had not much remarked it till now, when seeking to read therein secrets that concerned his darling's welfare. Lady Montfort's beauty was so perfect in that rare harmony of feature which poets, before Byron, have compared to music, that sorrow could no more mar the effect of that beauty on the eye than pathos can mar the effect of the music that admits it on the ear. But the change in her face seemed that of a sorrow which has lost all earthly hope. Waife therefore checked questions that took the tone of reproaches, and involuntarily murmured, "Pardon."

Then Caroline Montfort told him all the tender projects she had conceived for his grandchild's happiness—how, finding Lionel so disinterested and noble, she had imagined she saw in him the providential agent to place Sophy in the position to which Waife had desired to raise her; Lionel to share with her the heritage of which he might otherwise despoil her—both to become the united source of joy and of pride to the childless man who now favored the one to exclude the other. Nor in these schemes had the absent wanderer been forgotten. No; could Sophy's virtues once be recognized by Darrell, and her alleged birth acknowledged by him—could the guardian who, in fostering those virtues to bloom by Darrell's hearth, had laid under the deepest obligations one who, if unforgiving to treachery, was grateful for the humblest service—could that guardian justify the belief in his innocence which George Morley had ever entertained, and, as it now proved, with reason—then where on all earth a man like Guy Darrell to vindicate William Losely's attainted honor, or from whom William Losely might accept cherishing friendship and independent ease, with so indisputable a right to both! Such had been the picture that the fond and sanguine imagination of Caroline Montfort had drawn from generous hope, and colored with tender fancies. But alas for such castles in the air! All had failed. She had only herself to blame. Instead of securing Sophy's welfare she had endangered Sophy's happiness. They whom she had desired to unite were irrevocably separated. Bitterly she accused herself—her error in relying so much on Lionel's influence with Darrell—on her own early remembrance of Darrell's affectionate nature, and singular sympathies with the young—and thus suffering Lionel and Sophy to grow familiar with each other's winning characters, and carry on childlike romance into maturer sentiment. She spoke, though briefly, of her visit to Darrell, and its ill success—of the few letters that had passed since then between herself and Lionel, in which it was settled that he should seek no parting interview with Sophy. He had declared to Sophy no formal suit—they had exchanged no lovers' vows. It would be, therefore, but a dishonorable cruelty to her to say, "I come to tell you that I love you, and that we must part forever." And how avow the reason—that reason that would humble her to the dust? Lionel was forbidden to wed with one whom Jasper Losely called daughter, and whom the guardian she so venerated believed to be his grandchild. All of comfort that Lady Montfort could suggest was, that Sophy was so young that she would conquer what might be but a girl's romantic sentiment—or, if a more serious attachment, one that no troth had cemented—for a person she might not see again for years; Lionel was negotiating exchange into a regiment on active service. "Meanwhile," said Lady Montfort, "I shall never wed again. I shall make it known that I look on your Sophy as the child of my adoption. If I do not live to save sufficient for her out of an income that is more than thrice what I require, I have instructed my lawyers to insure my life for her provision; it will be ample. Many a wooer, captivating as Lionel, and free from the scruples that fetter his choice, will be proud to kneel at the feet of one so lovely. This rank of mine, which has never yet bestowed on me a joy, now becomes of value, since it will give dignity to—to Matilda's child, and—and to—"

Lady Montfort sobbed.

Waife listened respectfully, and for the time was comforted. Certainly, in his own heart he was glad that Lionel Haughton was permanently separated from Sophy. There was scarcely a man on earth, of fair station and repute, to whom he would have surrendered Sophy with so keen a pang as to Charles Haughton's son.

The poor young lovers! all the stars seemed against them! Was it not enough that Guy Darrell should be so obdurate? must the mild William Losely be also a malefic in their horoscope?

But when, that same evening, the old man more observantly than ever watched his grandchild, his comfort vanished—misgivings came over him—he felt assured that the fatal shaft had been broken in the wound, and that the heart was bleeding inly.

True; not without prophetic insight had Arabella Crane said to the pining, but resolute, quiet child, behind the scenes of Mr. Rugge's show, "How much you will love one day!" All that night Waife lay awake, pondering—revolving—exhausting that wondrous fertility of resource which teemed in his inventive brain. In vain!

And now—(the day after this conversation with Lady Montfort, whose illness grieves, but does not surprise him)—now, as he sits and thinks, and gazes abstractedly into that far, pale, winter sky—now, the old man is still scheming how to reconcile a human loving heart to the eternal loss of that affection which has so many perishable counterfeits, but which, when true in all its elements—complete in all its varied wealth of feeling—is never to be forgotten, and never to be replaced.

CHAPTER II.

An offering to the Manes.

Three sides of Waife's cottage were within Lady Montfort's grounds; the fourth side, with its more public entrance, bordered the lane. Now, as he thus sate, he was startled by a low timid ring at the door which opened on the lane. Who could it be?—not Jasper! He began to tremble. The ring was repeated. One woman-servant composed all his establishment. He heard her opening the door—heard a low voice; it seemed a soft, fresh young voice. His room-door opened, and the woman, who, of course, knew the visitor by sight and name, having often remarked him on the grounds with Lady Montfort and Sophy, said, in a cheerful tone, as if bringing good news, "Mr. Lionel Haughton."

Scarcely was the door closed—scarcely the young man in the room, before, with all his delightful, passionate frankness, Lionel had clasped Waife's reluctant hand in both his own, and, with tears in his eyes, and choking in his voice, was pouring forth sentences so loosely knit together, that they seemed almost incoherent;—now a burst of congratulation—now a falter of condolence—now words that seemed to supplicate as for pardon to an offense of his own—rapid transitions from enthusiasm to pity—from joy to grief—variable, with the stormy April of a young, fresh, hearty nature.

Taken so wholly by surprise, Waife, in vain attempting to appear cold and distant, and only very vaguely comprehending what the unwelcome visitor so confusedly expressed, at last found voice to interrupt the jet and gush of Lionel's impetuous emotions, and said as dryly as he could, "I am really at a loss to conceive the cause of what appears to be meant as congratulations to me and reproaches to yourself, Mr.—Mr. Haught—"; his lips could not complete the distasteful name.

"My name shocks you—no wonder," said Lionel, deeply mortified, and bowing down his head as he gently dropped the old man's hand. "Reproaches to myself!—Ah, Sir, I am here as Charles Haughton's son!"

"What!" exclaimed Waife, "you know? How could you know that Charles Haughton—"

Lionel (interrupting). "I know! His own lips confessed his shame to have so injured you."

Waife. "Confessed to whom?"

Lionel. "To Alban Morley. Believe me, my father's remorse was bitter; it dies not in his grave, it lives in me. I have so longed to meet with William Losely."

Waife seated himself in silence, shading his face with one hand, while with the other he made a slight gesture, as if to discourage or rebuke farther allusion to ancient wrong. Lionel, in quick accents, but more connected meaning, went on—

"I have just come from Mr. Darrell, where I and Colonel Morley (here Lionel's countenance was darkly troubled) have been staying some days. Two days ago I received this letter from George Morley, forwarded to me from London. It says—let me read it—'You will rejoice to learn that our dear Waife'—pardon that name."

"I have no other—go on."

"Is once more with his grandchild." (Here Lionel sighed heavily—sigh like Sophy's.) "You will rejoice yet more to learn that it has pleased Heaven to allow me and another witness, who, some years ago, had been misled into condemning Waife, to be enabled to bear incontrovertible testimony to the complete innocence of my beloved friend; nay, more—I say to you most solemnly, that in all which appeared to attest guilt there has been a virtue, which, if known to Mr. Darrell, would make him bow in reverence to that old man. Tell Mr. Darrell so from me; and add, that in saying it, I expressed my conviction of his own admiring sympathy for all that is noble and heroic.'"

"Too much—this is too, too much," stammered out Waife, restlessly turning away; "but—but, you are folding up the letter. That is all?—he does not say more?—he does not mention any one else?—eh—eh?"

"No, Sir; that is all."

"Thank Heaven! He is an honorable man! Yet he has said more than he ought—much more than he can prove, or than I—" He broke off, and abruptly asked, "How did Mr. Darrell take these assertions? With an incredulous laugh—eh?—'Why, the old rogue had pleaded guilty!'"

"Sir, Alban Morley was there to speak of the William Losely whom he had known; to explain, from facts which he had collected at the time, of what nature was the evidence not brought forward. The motive that induced you to plead guilty I had long guessed; it flashed in an instant on Guy Darrell; it was not mere guess with him! You ask me what he said? This: 'Grand nature! George is right! and I do bow my head in reverence!'"

"He said that?—Guy Darrell? On your honor, he said that?"

"Can you doubt it? Is he not a gentleman?"

Waife was fairly overcome.

"But, Sir," resumed Lionel, "I must not conceal from you, that, though George's letter and Alban Morley's communications sufficed to satisfy Darrell, without farther question, your old friend was naturally anxious to learn a more full account, in the hope of legally substantiating your innocence. He therefore dispatched by the telegraph a request to his nephew to come at once to Fawley. George arrived there yesterday. Do not blame him, Sir, that we share his secret."

"You do? Good Heavens! And that lawyer will be barbarous enough too; but no—he has an interest in not accusing of midnight robbery his daughter's husband; Jasper's secret is safe with him. And Colonel Morley—surely his cruel nephew will not suffer him to make me—me, with one foot in the grave—a witness against my Lizzy's son!"

"Colonel Morley, at Darrell's suggestion, came with me to London; and if he does not accompany me to you, it is because he is even now busied in finding out your son, not to undo, but to complete, the purpose of your self-sacrifice. 'All other considerations,' said Guy Darrell, 'must be merged in this one thought—that such a father shall not have been in vain a martyr.' Colonel Morley is empowered to treat with your son on any terms; but on this condition, that the rest of his life shall inflict no farther pain, no farther fear on you. This is the sole use to which, without your consent, we have presumed to put the secret we have learned. Do you pardon George now?"

Waife's lips murmured inaudibly, but his face grew very bright; and as it was raised upward, Lionel's ear caught the whisper of a name—it was not Jasper, it was "Lizzy."

"Ah! why," said Lionel, coldly, and after a short pause, "why was I not permitted to be the one to attest your innocence—to clear your name? I, who owed to you so much more than my debt! And now—dear, dear Mr. Losely—"

"Heh! Wife!—call me Waife st-ill—and always."

"Willingly! It is the name by which I have accustomed myself to love you. Now, listen to me. I am dishonored until at least the mere pecuniary debt, due to you from Jasper, is paid. Hist! hist!—Alan Morley says so—Darrell says so. Darrell says 'the sum must be an 6normous one before it be canceled.' Darrell lends me the means to do it; he would share his fortune with a pigeonwing like me. Before I could venture even to come hither, the sum due to you from my father was equal to—I forget—to some yesterday evening—saw Mr. Darrell's lawyer. I have taken a great liberty —I have insured this sum against loss in the purchase of an annuity for you. Mr. Darrell's lawyer had a client who was in immediate want of the same sum to you, and, not wishing permanently to burden his estate by mortgage, would give a larger interest by an annuity than to any the public offices would; excellent landed security. The lawyer did not like to part with the opportunity slip, so I ventured to act for you. It was all settled this morning. The purchase was on this paper, which will leave you free. Of course the sum due to you is not exactly the same as that which you mentioned to me before I was born. There is the interest—compound interest; nothing more. I don't understand such matters; Darrell's lawyer made the calculation—it must be right."

Waife held the paper, glanced at its contents, dropped it in confusion, amaze. Those hundreds lent swelled into all those thousands returned! Large sums—always small things—intensively—arithmetically—down to fractions. So that every farthing seemed, indeed, a thing to be lawfully done. And that sum invested in an annuity of 4500 a year!—income which, to poor Gentleman Waife, seemed wealth unspeakable!

"It is quite a business-like computation, I tell you, Sir," said his son-in-law, with a pride that cried Lionel, dismayed at Waife's look and gesture. "Compound interest will run up to what seems a large amount after a very child has grown up. That you can't deny Cocker and calculating tables, and that sort of thing. Now, Sir, I hope you can not have an eternal load of disgrace on the head of Charles Haughton's son."

"Poor Charlie Haughton," murmured Waife. "And I was feeling bitter against his memory —bitter against him—for—for—for—I could not touch us the injustice that dwells in anger! But —but—this can not be. I thank Mr. Darrell humbly—I can not take his bounty."

"It is not his money—it is mine; he only advances it to me. To me—to him still—I owe for he defeates the 4500 a year from the allowance he makes me. And I don't want such an absurd allowance as that before gambling with the Guards into the line—I mean to be a soldier in good earnest. Too much independence spoils a soldier—only gets one into scrapes. Alban Morley says the same. Darrell, too, says 'Eight or ten gold bits a day are enough for the payment of a father's debt!' You can not grudge me that luxury—you dare not!—why? because you are an honest man."

"Softly, softly, softly," said Waife. "Let me look at you. Don't look off Jasper's—don't let us think of money! What a look of your father's that is! Ah, Sir, you have been to see me! Charlie's sweet bright playful eyes—that might have turned aside from the path of duty—a mere father's effect! And you have a happy laugh, too, at the slightest joke! But this is not Charlie's—it is all your own cheering, with gentle finger, Lionel's broad truthful brow). Poor Charlie, he was grieved—you are right—I remember."

"Sir," said Lionel, who was now on one knee by Waife's chair—"Sir, I have never seen a woman for his blessing—not even Guy Darrell. Will you put your hand on my head; and oh! that in the mystic world beyond us, some angel may tell Charles Haughton that William Losely has blessed his son?"

Solemnly, but with profound humility—one hand on the Bible beside him, one on the young soldier's bended head—William Jasper blessed Charles Haughton's son—and, having done so, invocation by his sons opened, and blessing was followed by embrace.

CHAPTER III.

Nothing so obstinate as a negative's hope; nothing so eloquent as a lover's tongue.

HIPPARCHUS there had been no reference to Sophy. Not Sophy's name, but Lionel Haughton's son had knelt to Waife and received the old man's blessing. And Waife could see no long forgetful of his darling—nor his anxiety on her account. The expression in his varying face changed suddenly. Not had Jasper before, Lionel Haughton was the last man in the world to whom willingly he would have consigned his grandchild. Now, of all men in the world Lionel Haughton would have been his choice. He sighed heavily; he comprehended, by his own changed feelings, how tender and profound an affection Lionel Haughton might have won for a heart so fresh as Sophy's, and so tenacious of the impressions it received. But they were separated forever; she ought not even to see him. Uneasily Waife glanced toward the open window—rose involuntarily, closed it, and drew down the blind.

"You must go now, young gentleman," said he, almost churlishly.

The quick lover's sense in Lionel divined why the blind was drawn, and the dismissal so abruptly given.

"Give me your address," said Waife; "I will write about—that paper. Don't now stay longer—stay—yes!"

"Do not stay, Sir. I am not lingering here with the wish to see—her!"

Waife looked as easily contented; I could but have asked him to inquire, and satisfied himself. But he would not even hear me."

"He will hear you now, and with respect."

"He will!" cried Waife, joyously. "And if we should ingratiate—and if Sophy should prove to be, as I have ever believed, his daughter's child, would he not own, and receive, and cherish her?"

"Alas! Sir, do not let me pain you; but that is not my hope. If, indeed, it should prove that your son received your child, and was related to him—if she should be the child of mountain, not of plain—pardon me, Sir, that is my hope, my last hope—for then I would kneel once more at your feet, and implore your permission to be her husband. Ask me her hand."

"What! Mr. Darrell would consent to your union with the child of peasants, and not with his own grandchild?"

"Sir, Sir, you mock me to the heart; but if you knew all, you would not wonder to hear me say, 'I dare not ask Mr. Darrell to unite my union with the daughter of Jasper Losely.'"

Waife suppressed a groan, and began to pace the room with long and rapid steps.

"But," resumed Lionel, "go to Fawley yourself, Sir, and you will see how unfounded is the priest of kindred blood? Has it not been hallowed by all that makes Age and Childhood so dear a blessing to each other? Has it not been borne together? Were you not the first who thought her, in her infancy, necessary to you as a Mother in Nature, and pray to a Father which is in Heaven? Would all this be blotted out of your souls if she were now the child of the Jasper whom it chills you to remember? Sir, if there be no sin to a parent's charge, there is no sin to why have you taken such vigilant pains to separate a child from him whom you believe to be her father?"

Waife stood motionless and voiceless. This insistance appeared to him like cruelty.

"And, Sir," added Lionel, in a lower, sadder tone—"can I ask you, whose later life has been one sublime self-sacrifice, to consider me, rather than you might call Sophy grandchild, but as the husband of Sophy Losely, and the infant angel whom Heaven sent to your side when bereaved and desolate, and know also then how you bought Oh, Mr. Losely, you will see me that Sophy may not be your grandchild. Her home is not with you. Its separate attachment will not less replace to you your lost son—and on your knee her children may learn to lisp the sacred name of father as taught to her. Go to Darrell—go—go! and take me with you!"

"I will—I will," said Waife, musing, and snatching at his hat and staff—"Come—come! But Sophy should not learn that you have been forbidden—that I come away with you; it might set her thinking, dreaming, hoping—all to end in greater sorrow. Let her be cut out of the room, to examine the old woman, and to write a few hasty lines to Sophy herself—assuring her, on his most solemn honor, that he was not now flying from her to resume his vagrant life—that, without fail, placed in Darrell's power, he would return to her that night or the next day.

In a few minutes he reopened the room door, and, beckoning silently to Lionel, and then stole into the quiet lane with quick steps.

CHESS BY TELEGRAPH.

PHILADELPHIA versus NEW YORK.

The Chess world is there parts, as also in Philadelphia and its vicinity, has been set all agog by the announcement, and, in fact, commencement, of a consultation match between the strong men of the respective Chess circles of those cities; said match to be played through the telegraphic wires, gratuitously placed at their disposal by the American Telegraphic Company. The match was to consist of eleven games, of ten moves to games, should the latter become necessary to effect a decisive result—each side having the assistance by consultation, when players, although advising among themselves, are prohibited to touch the pieces until a move be decided upon. The Philadelphia Committee of players embraced Messrs. H. F. Montgomery, N. G. Thomas, F. Randolph, Lewis Elkin, and S. Lewis; for their surpass they named Mr. C. H. Stanley, of New York. The Committee of the New York players are Messrs. Theodore Lichtenstein, C. G. Mead, James Thompson, D. W. Fiske, and F. Perrin, being represented by Professor Alien, of Philadelphia, as their second.

On Tuesday evening last the New York players assembled punctually at six o'clock at the Eutaw's Room in the Merchants' Exchange, where the amplest accommodation, both for the parties engaged and for the public at large, were provided by Mr. Walker, the proprietor. The Philadelphians assembled at a like hour at their temporary quarters in the office of the Telegraph Company.

Although six o'clock was the time named for the commencement of the first game, yet accidental delay occurring, the first game, failing to the lot of New York, was not made until near seven, at which hour the attendance was very large. Twelve moves only were then made, when, according to a preliminary agreement, half past nine o'clock named the adjournment of proceedings until the evening following, when, at a similar hour, the remaining moves to Rotunda were promptly recorded. Seven additional moves were added to the game on this occasion, when it was again adjourned until Saturday, the 20th instant, and hard fighting may be expected.

And the game was adjourned, New York having the move.

NOTES.

(a) A proposition of the New York players having been declined by the party of the other part, that "P to K 4" should constitute the first move in the game, New Yorkers pretty resolutely chose that they would be taken to look for a other game, and they hereon set accordingly.

(b) Here the game was adjourned, New York having the move, and it was resumed on Saturday last.

(c) As has period the game was adjourned, to be resumed, at and following by embrace.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

A NYC recently calling at the house of a friend, found Saturday afternoon engaged in hunting a number of black spots, which had been received in a light by her two daughters, the Misses Schoolboy. "A Lighter!" cried to take away Charley's marbles," said Mamma, "and I don't know what to do with them." "Why, mother, Ma," cried the young hero. "Exactly," said the wit.

"Wheels to receive, and marble to retain."

A RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—A divided, nowadays.

Sheridan agreed with Walker that the pronunciation of sound should be upside, but insisted, contrary to Walker, that gold should be gould. Mr. Sheridan tells us that Lord Erskine, in his younger days, pronounced the word short, by saying "I have a great mind to fire at a sparrow flying in a wind." An illiberal critic retorted that this proved Erskine, by saying, "If I may be so bold, I should be glad to be told why you pronounce it so short."

In society, wheelers don't mix with retails; raw wool doesn't speak to halfpenny balls of worsted; tallow in the candle doesn't associate with the pound; and figtron turns up its nose at temporary suits.

ALL ABOUT NOTHING.

An apostate is a human wind-mill, who makes his bread by turning.

We should not care so much about growing old, if others didn't see it.

Unpopularity principally arises from a desire to please and the fear of not succeeding.

You may compare imagination to a pretty young girl who cheats at cards. The cheating is so agreeable, and without its playful, that, for the pleasure of the game, you rather encourage the young lady in her tricks.

A Frenchman writes letters home about his own affairs. He is Leicester Square, or America—as say, or subscribe himself—and he is not to be blamed. The Frenchman's letters are interesting, his great fault is in thinking about how to get back again to France. He never should have come at all for our country. He would get a fresh, set view in the world to catch a glimpse of his beloved Paris. To be in the Universe compared to the four corners of the boulevards. Elsewhere are only so many realms of exile.

PHYSIOLOGY OF PUBLIC ORATORY.

In public oratory words would seem to take a far higher rank than in private life. You hear many a male orator in Democratic, stuttering to express himself, say that he was not a ready speaker, but he never heard any one use the word in private conversation, or as Irishmen—the more honest to express himself, "I am not a ready speaker, I really was not prepared for this."

NOTIONS, BOTH RUDE AND CRUDE.

Love is a Satirical, Friendship a Conservative.

Many a man would get on much better with it as a large one.

Those who never admire others are rarely admired themselves.

The worst form of ingratitude is to refuse to accept a favor from the hands of a person to whom you have had the pleasure of conferring one.

The reason why justice is so often denied is because it is demanded as a favor. Why should it be? Rights are solicited as a favor it would be much more frequently granted.

Money is but the means to an end—a means to live, and, but if others run away from him, instantly he gets rid of it, and, if it strikes us that he is a fool, we are following the good example that had been set to them in the first instance by the fugitive.

Flattery to a French fashionable woman becomes, after a time, sweet and indispensable as tobacco to a man with the one as with the other, it all depends upon the delicacy of the application.

Fame is a Temple no one can only mount a step at a time.

A Frenchman would say: "Je vous aime mon par de dessus."

Instantly another is attacked, how eagerly we all cry out "Stop thief!" when we have been robbed ourselves, or calling in his services till the very last moment ourselves! Isn't it just to punish the same with philosophy?

A Steuben County friend writes to Harper's Weekly: "I have an acquaintance by the name of Peas Orton. He is a man of original ideas, and thinks for himself. His definition of accessaries and luxuries of life would be interesting to many of your readers, especially to the farmers. One day having an order on a small country store, I found him there. He was in search for anything they had in the store. He inquired if they had any pickles. They had not. He inquired if they had any olives. "Olives, then," said he, "I guess I'll take about three pounds." He then inquired for anchovies, sardines, and other luxuries, but, "Olives then," said he, "I'll take his head and deliberated for some time; but at last said, as though he had not heard any different opinion, "Well, I guess I might as well take a couple pounds more of them olives." Pickles was weighed out, and the bill for olives, and the inquiry repeated, "What next?" Peas said he, "I guess I'll take a keg of that ale and call it study. The merchant sagaciously suggested that he had some very fine Scotch whisky. "Whisky," said he, a smile irradiating his countenance as though the suggestion had been a ray of light from heaven, "Whisky, I'll take a barrel of that, and now, boys, to business."

One of the neatest replies we ever read of was that of a certain cat marshal, who, being found fault with by his sovereign for not having subscribed for a newspaper, said, "Please your Majesty, I will try and do better next time."

"Taking the one with the other," said the Rev. Sydney Smith, "I believe my congregation are the most extraordinary people I ever met with. Some of them are very fond of me, and others cut me. Such are the facts."

A duel was fought in Mississippi, last month, by S. Knott and A. W. Short. The result was, Knott was shot, and Short was not. The seconds determined no second shots should have been fired then Knott.

Oh, Lord—Such a man recently took a lawyers have of dressing up deeds and documents. It is almost enough to frighten a person to death to look at the bill of fare. The following is a fair sample: "Suppose a man wished to give another a deed for the purpose of making a legal declaration, and saying, 'I give you that orange,' he must set forth in the deed that he was seized in his hereby give you, all and singular, my estate and interest, title, claim, and demand of, in and to that orange, with all its rind, skin, juice, pulp, and pips, and all rights and appurtenances thereto full power to sell, suck, bite, or otherwise eat the same orange, or give the same away to any person he may think proper, as fully and entirely as I, the said A. B., could do if I had not executed these presents," and so on to the end of the chapter, or any other deed or deeds, instruments of what kind or nature to the same may be necessary or convenient."

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, Nov. 22, 1858.

During the early part of the week Flour, Wheat, and Corn were in full request at steadyer rates, but for the past two days they have been in dark demand at declining prices. Rye and Barley have been in moderate request for, and have advanced. Oats have been dull and heavy; Cotton has been more sought after, and declines a shade firmer. Provisions have been unsettled, but are now in better request. Sugar and Coffee have been quiet. Naval Stores, Oils, and Tobacco have been rather lightly dealt in. Hides, Leather, and Wool have been in active demand and improving in price, and has been in fair request. The occurrence of Thanksgiving Day has interrupted trade to a great extent, and heavier sales from first hands have been made than reflect or had leaked out, especially as regards Cotton and the late Winter and early Spring trade, for which fair purchases have been obtained. Groceries, Drugs, and Dyes have been plenty. Heavy Western have been the shipments, for the week ending this day, of Flour and Wheat, as compared with the corresponding week in 1857, and the aggregate from the opening of navigation, as per Auditor's Canal Report, is 1,000,000 bbls. of Flour, and some week last year. The movements in other commodities were moderate, and unprovided for in the annexed table aforesaid.... We append a revised list of the closing prices for the leading articles:

HARDING'S EDITIONS
OF THE
HOLY BIBLE.

The subscribers have recently stereotyped several new sets of plates of Family Bibles, the type of which is clear, beautiful, and of extra large size. The text is the most reliable, being carefully revised and corrected, from the Original Edition of the year 1613. These editions are printed in the very best manner, upon fine white paper, and illustrated with numerous fine steel plates and brilliant illuminations, new family record, &c. The binding embraces every variety of finish, rich turkey morocco, antiques, and other magnificent styles. The prices are greatly reduced, and will be found the cheapest, varying from one to fifty dollars, thereby placing a copy of the Holy Bible within the reach of every family in the land, however limited its means.

PULPIT BIBLES for all religious denominations; and also the same Bibles for the various associations, including the Masonic and Odd-Fellows' fraternities, &c.

DYSPEPSIA AND FITS
DR. O. PHELPS BROWN,
THE GREAT AMERICAN CURE FOR CONSUMPTION, was for several years so badly afflicted by Dyspepsia that a part of the time he was confined to his bed. He was eventually cured by a prescription which he obtained from a physician in Paris. This prescription, given here by a more simple process, is a gift of Providence, and every body who has taken it, never having failed once. It is equally as sure in cases of Fits as of Dyspepsia.

An engraving is here given of the principal herb employed in this medicine, and all of the ingredients are to be found in any drug store. I will send this valuable prescription to any person, on the receipt of one stamp to pay postage, free of charge.

THE CUTTER "CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS."

We engrave below the cutter Christopher Columbus, in which Mr. Charles R. Webb has recently crossed the ocean. As she is only 45 tons burden, she and her owner are attracting a good deal of attention.

Every one remembers the arrival at Liverpool, in July, 1857, of a small craft named the Charter Oak, only 23 tons burden, from New York, her owner and builder having performed the perilous passage across the Atlantic in this frail bark with a single companion. The adventurous navigator, whose name is Charles R. Webb, has now accomplished a second enterprise of the kind, having arrived at Southampton on 2d October, in a small cutter named the Christopher Columbus—this time accompanied by two boys, both eighteen years of age, neither of them previously acquainted with nautical pursuits. The cutter sailed from New York on the 19th of August, and occupied forty-five days in the voyage. She is only 45 tons burden, 33 feet in length over all, 5 feet keel, 16 feet in width, and the mast is 50 feet 6 inches long. She has no raised bulwarks, the deck being merely protected by a stout rope sustained by iron stanchions. Her greatest draught of water is 6 feet. A more frail-looking bark in which to cross the stormy Atlantic it is scarcely possible to conceive.

The Christopher Columbus was built at Stamford, Connecticut, in seven months, every part of the work being executed by Webb himself, except the stepping of the mast and the rigging, even to the cutting down and shaping of the timber with which she is constructed. Webb is a native of Stamford, twenty-nine years of age, and a shipwright by trade, his nautical knowledge, as he tells us, having been gained while working as a carpenter on board a Liverpool packet-ship. This is the seventeenth voyage he has made across the Atlantic—nine out and eight home. The two boys by whom he was accompanied in his daring adventure are named George Coles and Sam Scobell. The voyage has been conducted throughout on strict temperance principles, and the stores of provisions were of a very modest and un-epicurean character, comprising only biscuit, mackerel, and hams, with a little salt beef. The vessel is built of oak, and sloop-rigged. A plain cabin, with sleeping recesses on either side, in the centre of the vessel, the stores occupying either end, constitutes the whole internal economy of this remarkable craft.

Not the least curious part of the whole affair is the log, kept in a very rough manner on a few sheets of foolscap paper stitched together, the entries all made in pencil, ink being evidently an unknown commodity on board. We subjoin a copy of the log for the benefit of nautical readers who may feel interested in the daily progress of so very remarkable a passage.

SOMEWHERE TO GO.

'Twas on a moonlight Sunday eve,
In warm October time,
I sat alone, and listened to
The calling church-bells' chime;
And every one that reached my ear
Were stronger bells to me,
For I was in the stranger's land,
Far o'er the distant sea.

I took my glass from off the wall,
I gazed into its deeps,
And pondered as I thought of Time,
How stealthily he creeps.
The wrinkles mark my sunken cheek.
The silver tinge my hair,
My eye has lost its lustre now,
And speak is world of care.

Ah, me! I can not help the thoughts
The chiming bells will bring—
These Sabbath eves when I was young
And happy as a king.
The sorrow now that swells my heart
I had not learned to know,
And every Sunday night that came
I'd somewhere then to go.

I have a memory to-night
That fills my lonely room—
A sunny face, a winsome smile
That lightens up the gloom;
I have a memory of an eye
That made my own to glow,
On Sunday nights, in times when I
Had somewhere I could go.

On Sunday nights, with extra care,
I stood before my glass,
And studied that I should not let
An imperfection pass.
I dressed for eyes that thought me quite
A model of a beau,
And marry were the Sunday nights
I'd somewhere I could go.

I have a memory of some curls
That often swept my cheek,
A head that pressed my bosom, till
I lost the power to speak.
I have a memory of an arm
As white as driven snow,
That clasped my neck on Sunday nights
When somewhere I could go.

For I was young, and she was pure,
And all our dream was love—
I thought my pride Abigail
An angel from above.
The future was a casket locked,
It opened sure and slow,
And closed upon the Sunday nights
When somewhere I could go.

Ah! well, the time has passed away,
And I am here alone,
And baby Abbie, whom I loved,
Has sworn of her own.
The dark-brown curls that swept my cheek
Have lost their wildering flow;
The thirty years of Sunday nights
Since I could somewhere go.

Yet, 'tis a pleasant memory,
Though I am here alone,
To know my gentle baby-love
Has sworn of her own.

For I am sure amid those loves
My own must slightly glow,
As she recalls the Sunday nights
When I—could somewhere go.

Then let the years roll swiftly by,
And leave me here alone,
To listen to the chiming bells
Of unfamiliar tone.
I'll live upon the memories
That in my heart are known,
Though Sunday nights may come, and I
Have nowhere now to go.

BANK REFORM.

SINCE our last paper went to press, a pamphlet has been published on the reform of the currency. It is signed by George Opdyke, Charles G. Hunt, James Gallatin, and John Eadie. It reviews certain existing or alleged defects in the currency system, and suggests, in order to remedy them, it is necessary to repeal the usury laws; to suppress all bank-notes under $100; to establish a system of banking by the General Government; to prohibit all loans by banks over and above the aggregate amount of the capital paid in; that the capital of all banks shall be compel all banks to keep an amount of specie on hand equal to twenty per cent. of their discounts.

It is well known that the conferences which have led to the birth of this pamphlet were suggested by the difficulties and confusion into which our banks were forced by the crisis of last fall. In the summer of 1857 the choice of city, in defiance of the warnings of their wisest advisers, persisted in expanding their loans until the disproportion between discounts and specie was so monstrous that a panic was inevitable. It came. The banks, too late, attempted to curtail their loans. In the endeavor they broke; and the Clearing House, equivocal, unmistaken law of the State was deliberately violated by the Judges of the Supreme Court, in order to save the community from the grave inconvenience of a general bank suspenstion. Smarting under a consciousness of an unmerited violation of law, many bank officers have been fidgeting ever since; the result of their throes is the pamphlet in question.

Of this pamphlet it may be said, in the words of the old critic, that there is much in it that is new, and much in it that is good, but the iniquity is that that which is new is not good, and that which is good is not new. Every one who was competent to form an opinion on the subject, was long ago satisfied that the absurdity known by the name of usury laws ought to be swept from the statute book. In like manner, no one contends that the issue of small notes is useful or even safe. Thus for the pamphleteers have the customary public authority with them.

But when we come to consider their proposal with reference to the requirements of the two counts, the case is very different. The general principle of a bank is that it shall be able at all times to redeem its notes, and is subject to restriction, and in this wise: As, in fact, bullion is not intrinsically more valuable than paper; as a man can not drink his gold coin himself with, or shelter himself under gold or silver; and as it is merely by universal consent that these metals derive a value, and are being accepted by the leading mercantile nations as representatives of specific values, there is an impossibility in establishing other representatives of value, even of so worthless a nature as white paper. All that is requisite to place white paper on a par with specie is, that the public shall be convinced that it will continue to represent as much wheat and as much land as the like amount of specie represents. To establish a sound banking law exists, this is the case. In the State of New York, for instance, no one doubts that city bank-notes will forever remain at par with specie. They possess two resources—their specie and their capital—the former a real, the latter an imaginary resource; but both, under the circumstances, equally valuable. Bank-notes are as valid representatives of real values, such as land or wheat, as coined specie. The principle of modern banks, therefore, is that they shall be at all times able to pay in coin so much of their circulation and deposits as their credit will generally render them liable to be called on to redeem.

The question, therefore, which modern financiers puzzle their heads to determine is this: How much is a bank's credit worth? On the face of it no specific answer to the question can be made. Credit is one of those speculative creatures of fancy which can not be governed by fixed rules, and yet the ton, or the dollar. Yet financiers throughout the world have dared to estimate its price in figures. In England for many years it was considered safe for a bank to hold in specie one pound for every three of its liabilities. The idea was, that under all circumstances, two-thirds of the creditors of a bank would forbear to press it for coin. The New York pamphleteers, Messrs. Opdyke & Company, are more liberal. Judging from the temper of the New York community, as evidenced on 13th October, 1857, they are prepared to assert that four-fifths of the creditors of New York banks may be safely relied upon as men who will not run the bank for specie, but will think that if coin be kept on hand in quantity sufficient to pay the remaining fifth, the banks will be safe. If by any impossibility the bank should enlarge its discounts, or part with its specie so that it should only have on hand coin enough to pay one-sixth instead of one-fifth of its creditors, then it would be in a fatal position.

It suffices to state these positions to show their absurdity. In a time of panic, as every body knows, a bank may be unsafe though it hold an amount of specie equal to even half or three-fourths its liabilities. It is utterly ridiculous to measure public confidence by figures, and to say that four-fifths, or three-fourths, or two-thirds of the creditors of a bank will be content with notes instead of specie. If the panic be decided, no bank will be safe which does not contain a dollar of bullion for every dollar it owes; and if it does so, there will be no panic, and the bank will be a losing concern.

The only guarantee that can be devised for bank solvency is a general diffusion of sound principles of trade, and a resolute selection by shareholders in banks of the best men to control their administration. If banks had no cause to mystify and thereby encourage private capitalists to lend, at usurious rates, to railways and other speculative enterprises, they must expend their capital to follow. If they persist in trying to make dividends on their capital at a time when the business of the country does not remunerate any one, they must expect to lose. The best guarantee for the people and the best check on the banks is the public which we have, provided the judges will have the honesty to execute it. As to the plan of limiting the discounts to a fixed amount, it is as silly as if one were to propose that no man should spend more than so much a year. Messrs. Opdyke & Co. mean well; they are manifestly with a desire to be useful in the matter, had better try if some means can not be devised to make the judges do their duty; beyond this, their efforts are likely to be superfluous, and may provoke derision.

THE PRESIDENTIAL MESSAGE ON MEXICO.

EITHER has it that President Buchanan will, in his forthcoming Message, take decided ground in favor of armed intervention in Mexican affairs by the United States. The State Department has now before is well-authenticated cases of outrages committed by the Mexican Government upon United States citizens. The President can not neglect these without betraying his trust. He will not falsify the Mexicans have adhered to the stipulations contained in the treaty of Guadeloupe Hidalgo it remains to be seen; certain it is, at all events, that the various governments which from time to time have held sway in the Mexican States have each and all of them failed to comply with the promises made by Mexico to the American grantees of the Tehuantepec route. It is difficult to see how the President can shirk this grievance. And, independently of the specific injuries involved in these cases, it is very doubtful whether the controlling influence exercised by the United States on this continent does not involve a responsibility which implies a quasi-guarantee of peace and order throughout the entire continent.

Let us illustrate the case: Brown, Jones, and Smith are settlers in a country far removed from civilization. Brown forbids any further intercourse independent of each other. Brown has —in theory—no right to interfere with Jones, or Jones with Brown. Yet, in practice, these are the conditions of social existence—if Jones or Smith lead so disorderly a life that people can not visit Brown without danger, or if any one of the three so conduct himself as to give a bad name to the neighborhood, an obligation to reform is imposed on the injured member of the community. In civilized society Brown may look to Smith or Jones to maintain decency of or riotous conduct; in a state of nature he may compel his neighbors, by the exercise of force, to restrain themselves soberly and decorously. This is precisely the case of the United States and Mexico. Strictly speaking, the United States have no right to interfere with Mexico. Mexico is as independent of Northern control as Paraguay or Brazil. It is a free country—a republic like this. Yet, so vitally important is it that commerce and civilization should be suffered to progress securely, that when the United States government sees that a mob, or rich merchants, stop mails, suspend postal communication, arrest the administration of justice, and set at nought the laws of humanity, rapine, and general disorder and crime, it becomes incumbent, on any neighboring nation which has the power to interfere—just as Brown is bound to interfere in the domestic concerns of Smith or Jones when the latter disturb his peace, impede his intercourse with the outside world, and damage the fair fame of his locality.

Mexico has evidently reached the turningpoints in her history. Thirty years have been elapsed since she threw off the colonial yoke. Since then she has tried, in turns, every possible form of government, from the despotism and imperial despotism to a democratic republic. All have proved equally unsuccessful. She has gone from bad to worse, until, at the present time, neither trade nor property are safe within her borders and even life is imperiled unless some powerful government, such as the British Consul, condescends to protect it.

It seems that it is the bounden duty of this republic to take some steps to restore the tranquil sphere from the danger and disgrace brought upon it by the conduct of the Mexicans. The leading European powers have also declared to interfere in the affairs of Greece and Rome—not with a view to conquest or profit, but solely in order to avoid the scandal and danger of permanent anarchy in an established nation of Europe. We should do the same in Mexico. We do not desire territorial aggrandizement. We would rather not accept Mexico as a gift. But it is for our own and the United States interests, it is due to the civilization of the age, that we—who will not suffer England or Spain to subjugate Mexico—should put an end to the state of lending what aid may be necessary to re-establish order in that country, be the cost what it may.

THE PARDONING BUSINESS.

In an article published in this journal more than a year since, we had occasion to relate the history of the policy of the British with regard to the execution of sentences of transportation on criminal offenders. We mentioned that for many years sentences of transportation were merely nominal. A man who was sentenced to Botany Bay for fourteen years went out and then got his liberty; he who was exiled for life was liberated after eight or ten years' servitude; while the convict sentenced for four years, got off with six months. Some two or three years ago the attention of the authorities was directed to the defective practical working of this system; it was shown that in a majority of cases pardons were granted to men not arrested for crime; and while, in a few cases, pardoned convicts reformed, the interests of society were generally sacrificed to the sentimentality for the comfort of criminals. On this discovery the British Government retraced its steps. It directed that in all cases convicts must serve out their term religiously. This, we believe, is the system at present. We are led to conclude that it works satisfactorily.

In this State we adhere to the system which has been abandoned by the British. Hardly any of the sentences pronounced by the Courts are faithfully executed. A man sentenced to ten years State's prison for heinous crime serves a term and is pardoned out. He who is sentenced for five years, serves one, or two at most. He who is sentenced for one year, scarcely remains long enough to learn the name of acquaintance of the turnkeys. Under the present State Constitution the only important function left to the Governor is the exercise of the pardon; we must say that our Governors use it pretty freely.

The last case in which the prerogative has been used by the Governor of this State has been in pardoning one Jackson, an emigrant servant girl, who had been tried for and convicted of rape upon an emigrant girl in Brooklyn. The case was very clear. Two girls were decoyed by Jackson into a house of ill-fame—into a place of safety and outraged. It appears since the trial that the girls' testimony was not at variance as might have been supposed. On the strength of this the judges united in a recommendation to mercy, and the Governor forthwith pardoned. We confess that we are at a loss to imagine what motives led to this misjudged exercise of clemency. There was no palliation in the outrage. Had the girls been of the lowest order of degraded females, the guilt of their assailants would have been the same. To expect ignorant girls to make no mistakes, and not to contradict themselves, under the circumstances attending the trial, is absurd. We still half exacted at the memory of the outrage, is unreasonable. And that emigrants are habitually the victims of the unscrupulous of villains known as emigrant runners no one can doubt. The necessity of an example was obvious. Jackson nevertheless, with no mercy signed by the judges, and the clergymen, and the leading men of Brooklyn, every one knows how easy it is to get people of every station to sign such documents; a conscientious Governor should pay no attention whatever to them.

Jackson, however, has been pardoned out, and simultaneously one of the most horrible cases of outrage and infamy has been published in the papers. The Governor may congratulate himself on the result of his clemency. Let it

THE LOUNGER.

CAISSA.

A CORRESPONDENT lately asked about this Goddess or Nymph. He suggested that I should have said nothing upon the subject, and that even Smith and Anthon were at fault. It was very apt information at a time of such universal interest in the game of chess as the present—a time when thousands of dollars are staked over the contests are doubtless spread with the game now pending between New York and Philadelphia—and a question which the learned Dr. D. W. F., "the best authority," clearly answers as follows:

"Caissa is the heroine of Sir William Jones's poem on the Game of Chess, one of the finest productions of his pleasing pen. In this poem he explains the etymology of the word; and I have no doubt that the name was invented by himself. He thus introduces her:

"A lovely Dryad ranged the Thracian wild,
Her air enchanting and her aspect mild:
To shade her beauty Love and Wit was all her fury.
Averse from Hymen and the Cyprian fair,
O'er hills and valleys was her time spent,
And fair Caissa was the damsel named.'

"It was to please her that Mars found out the game of chess:

"He taught the rules that guide the pensive game,
And called it Caissa from the Dryad's name.
(Whence Ablon's sons, who most its praise confess, Approved in the play, and named it thoughtful Chess.)

"The whole poem was written in 1763, when the author was only sixteen years of age. Its idea was taken from Vida's Scacchia, ludus, or the game of chess which Scacchia, which is legitimately derived from Scacchi, the modern Latin word for chess. Since the publication of Sir William Jones's poem Caissa has been regarded as the Muse or Goddess of Chess; and the adjective Caissan (or, or relating to, chess) has been frequently used by writers on the game. LANDOR IN EXILE.

THE muse has followed poor Landor to the Tuscan shore; and she looks backward with yearning and regret, and the man never looked. "Farewell, Val d'Arno to some humble hamlet far away; and turning, sings:

WITCOMBE.

Witcombe! few seek with these their resting-place:
But I, when I have run my course,
Will throw my bones among the thorns and turf:
Although malignant waves on them should flow,
Here strand on, and a hundred years
My hoary head above the blazing surf,
Perhaps my dreams may see me here,
And what I could not in long life forget.
My fancy may remember me too dear;
Perhaps some gentle maiden passing by
May beave from true-love hour a generous sigh,
And say "So happier than who sleepest here."

A UNIVERSITY.

COLUMBIA COLLEGE is growing old. But, happily, far from showing any sign of senility, it is renewing its youth and winning fresh laurels. Apparently struck with the fact that a rich institution of learning should be of some practical use to men and women in the world, it has opened its doors for a month to popular courses of lectures by most capable men; and it at this moment more of a University, in the true sense of that word, than any college in the land.

It is an interesting fact, too, and one to be especially remarked during the present excitement with a project of a Library for Women, that the venerable College, which has hitherto treated lightly by the Harvard and Yale, the Dartmouth and Union men, as a mere city High School, and has been long the most closed door of learning possible to mankind, has not only opened its doors to these admirable lectures, but has opened them to women. Not in any of the expansive cynicism, Yet it is a beautiful instance of gallantry of the old school—of the kind that the Lord of Misrule commends. It is an inspiring spectacle, that of our venerable Columbia lifting its hat and making low bows of welcome to the sex!

And why not?

Doubtless the good old College reasoned thus: "If it be proper—if the clergy and faculty and the entire civic municipality agree that it is proper for women to hear miscellaneous evening lectures upon morals, science, literature, and history—is there any impropriety in their going to hear these lectures upon the same subjects? What is every professor duly learned in science and letters, in a college may go ahead?" And thereupon the courtly Columbia seizes by the hand its sister, the modest, smiling, whispers, "This way, ladies; this way!"

Miss Blackwell—a sketch of whose career, from "Chamber's Edinburgh Miscellany," was lately published in the World—and Miss Hunt both bear witness to the difficulties they encountered in getting to lectures at Harvard—which, after all, they did not succeed in hearing. And Professor Agassiz often lectures in Cambridge, at the college, to a dozen or twenty young men more or less interested in the subjects; while hundreds of women who would gladly hear are not admitted. Yet the very same evening the genial Professor might be sure in a hall, in the very same town, upon the very same subjects, and the hall be crowded with intelligent men and women.

There is such a profound difference between needle-dim and needle-doubt!

This movement of Columbia College, this reform—if a Lounger might respectfully use such a word in speaking of that honored institution—has not yet been visited by the public indignation. In truth, the newspapers unhesitatingly report that often more than half the audience is composed of women. And with these annual courses of lectures and the Library for Women, which is open the Astor and other public libraries, the use of which is not restricted by sex), we may all feel that good steps are taking—that the world moves—and that, whatever the other rights of women may be, their right to the best education which the times afford is about as clear as that of men.

OPERATIC.

But not musical, this time; for we mean the Professional quarrel.

It is certainly an immensely important the rows of small opera people are! Every season we have papers full of cavilings, and manifestoes, and ridicule, upon subjects of the least possible interest to any human being or thing except an opera manager and his necessities.

Yet as journalist—although the gust has blown over—we must say a word; at least, a word; at least, a Lounger may be sufferer to have his say. If you drop the mouth of a Lounger from talking of an opera quarrel, what will you have? Sing of him? Or to open it?

Mr. Dillon regards Prima Donnas in the light of merchandise, and naturally chafes at their dictation. Perhaps, if we are, love my dog. If you do not like my Prima Donna's conduct, sir, If you insult me, I cut off your admission, and insult you in public again.

The Lounger knows something about this business. It is not five hundred years since he was a prisoner in the upper gallery of the opera for a morning paper. He didn't like the Lucia of Madame Nobolini—he thought her a disagreeable artist—and he said so frankly.

Oh! Heaven!—as the historian of the Great Frederick's opera time came messengers, manager, and agents. "What has happened? How has this management offended? Why the hidden wrong has dictated an article so injurious to the opera, so mortifying to Madame Nobodini? That Prima Donna Landon loves her bed is not concerning from pure charity. Can nothing be done? Would a bouquet accept after the opera and the hostile critic to appreciate the performance more justly? Don't—don't, we beseech you!" Say nothing, if you will, but we beseech you—be politic.

What could any foolish-hearted Lounger say to such a piteous call? He could not bribe—he was indeed, but he was troubled by a sense of duty. He had undertaken to tell the public what he knew. To operate it, were to——To be silent, was to shirk his responsibility. To condemn it, was to occasion pecuniary loss to the hanging of a man with chagrin. It was a pitiful dilemma.

But still, if Mr. Dillon will put Signor Sobodini in Attracos—unless you have some better reason than the idle word of an idle gossip in an operahouse.

Let us hope these troubles are over. They only serve to show us that the opera is a thing precarious, precarious, and its profits—except to a very few and rarely—is not at all extraordinary.

DECIDEDLY A QUESTION.

SIDNEY SMOKEWAY with the laying of the Atlantic wire, so that it was possible for him to be about to serve us, Lord Carlingford, in England, announces to the public that he is about to test experimentally the principle of lateral navigation," that the airbroker, or aërial chartist, in the construction of which his friendship has long been engaged, is now ready to show and proved the perfection of its principle, and of the manner in which it has been carried out, it is now a question decidedly a question for the paying of bringing it out, and then for the whole world to witness the most thoroughly-de facto discovery, advancing civilization and administering to the happiness and prosperity of mankind.

What can be more delightful? While our messages flash under the sea, we shall fly over it. The sea-serpent will be nothing. We shall have messages of brine, useful, chemically, in correcting the atmosphere, but feed from all kinds of ocean. Ships, also, unlucky passenger should chance to tumble out of the airbroken.

PORTRAIT OF BOLIVAR.

One of the picturesque heroes of modern times, whose name is familiar to every child in the world, is Simon Bolivar. Lander, who always honored republicans, dedicated one of his books to the Liberator. Although it might be difficult to show now that Bolivar was a very great leader, and has many claims upon South American hero as the foe as well as its friend of Bolivar, have recalled the name of the hero. The Legislative committee of Venezuelans who have come to New York to recall General Paez to his loyal countrymen, having seen a poor portrait of Bolivar in the City Hall, have just presented the city with a likeness of "our most illustrious fellow-citizen, Simon Bolivar, the eminent son of Caracas, the liberator of Venezuela, New Granada, Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia."

Our friends in the country, when they come to town, will look at Bolivar. It might be well City Hall and looking upon the portrait; but those who can not come may be glad to see a picture of Bolivar, drawn by the pen of his biographer.

"Simon Bolivar is five feet four inches in height; his carriage is light and graceful; his body is compact, his lived brown; his eyes are of a middle size and such deep in his head, which is covered thinly with hair; his mustaches give him a dark and wild aspect, particularly when he is in a passion. His whole body is thin and meagre. He has the appearance of a man sixty-five years old. In walking his arms are in continual motion. He can not walk long, but becomes soon fatigued. He lives his hammock, where he sits or lolls. He gives way to sudden fits of resentment, and becomes in a moment a madman, throws himself into his hammock and utters curses and imprecations upon all around him. He likes to indulge in sarcasm upon absent persons; musts only light French literature; is bold, rude, and passionately fond of waltzing. He is fond of hearing himself talk, and of giving tasks. His activity, and destitute of, and from without, he is perfectly free from passion and desire of temper. He then becomes timid, mild, docile, and even submissive. In a great measure he conceals his faults under the politeness of a man educated in the so-called best sense, and possesses an almost Asiatic talent for dissimulation, and sufficiently mankind better than most of his countrymen.

It is curious at a moment when the South American struggles, and Bolivar himself, have entirely passed into history, to find in the reports of daily events in the city of New York the public farewell of General Paez, the Venezuelan hero. We seem to have turned back a few pages: and the fame of Bolivar is forgotten when Paez says of him: "He was my chief, my companion, and my friend."

And now Paez is himself the hero of a new honorable history. A brave old soldier, who has fought and suffered for his country's independence and as long as his country will atone for his long forgetfulness, and crown his latest days with prosperity and peace.

THOSE SEPOYS.

One of the excellent daily papers has received the most startling news from Sepoy Island. The fact seems to be that there is something as remarkable, but in the associations of that wretched region that you may as well believe the worst thing you can think of Sepoys, and then that will not be bad enough.

However, their wind-bag is pricked this time. It seems they have been giving money, and holding meetings, and have contracted for the destruction of the Anglo-Saxon buildings of temporary brick, temporary trick, and temporary slate. An officer of the United States army is now engaged in the real dollars to be succeeded in conquering the garrison. This he is to do by conducting a Sepoy corps to the grounds; pretend that they will do a deal mea, in parties of twenty each (making, by accurate arithmetic, ten parties), every man to be paid two hundred dollars. For that sum he is to plant short scaling-ladders against the walls—in many cases his fellows he is to climb over and attack the Army of Occupation, supposed by that time to be reduced to a mere handful of fifty-seven five hundred of the staunchest Sepoys surround the walls, destroy them, ditto the buildings—and engage, finally, all hands, banner and music, with the brave soldiers who have been so valiantly mounting guard over the property and the public fever. The whole to occur upon the arrival of a smaller force and a larger subscription than are at present required.

There is not the slightest error of the cock or the crow in the plan in this story. It is evidently authentic and accurate. It "has come to the knowledge of the Commissioners of Emigration." That settles it. It is simply a case of reading and acting before it happens. Sepoy conspirators always have their plans known beforehand. They are wise to communicate their plans to the estimable gentleman who furnishes Sepoy Island news for the daily papers. They can't resist his profound sagacity. He warns it all out, even to the numbers and prices—even to the two hundred dollars in the exact sum subscribed, and each of the advancing party is to receive two hundred dollars.

But why not make it twenty hundred dollars at once? Is it possible that he has not heard the price? Has he not heard how that the programme of attack is to be published in the daily papers of New York, and announced from all the Sepoy pulpits on the previous Sunday? That his Excellency the Governor, and the Honorable Board of Commissioners of Emigration, and the Chief of Police are to be invited as distinguished guests? That the ferry-boats are to run every five minutes on that day, and every arrangement made to accommodate the public?

Alas! he has not any such things are always managed. The Lounger therefore advises his friends to keep a sharp look-out for the two hundred dollars, the nine hundred dollars apiece, with short scaling-ladders at eight dollars a score, and the five hundred Sepoys assembling and shouting for the privilege at about thirty dollars a head. And when seen, make a note of.

But seriously, what is to be done with these misguided Sepoys, who threaten to prove so serious and lasting an annoyance? Is there no more patient intelligence and good citizenship refuse to be absurdly exposed to deadly pestilence and disease? Is every other means have been tried and failed, what are you going to do about it? When a community of such people is established in a city, should it await the operation of law for the removal of a deadly pest, and—knowing perfectly well that the operation of the law is thwarted, and will continue to be thwarted, by a despotic money interest—quietly renovate the pest, what are you going to do about it? What can you do about it, except maintain the peace—if that be your pleasure—by a foreign force superior to that of the community?

What was that process called when England drove out the Jesuits?

Is that the way a republican state should maintain an institution confessedly destructive of the very of scores of innocent lives, and maintain it among a people who have been and protested until so long, that domestic affection can ask them to bear and protect any longer?

THE LYCEUM.

An English gentleman has lately written to the London Times, complaining of the lordly air assumed by the noblemen who, in the recess of Parliament, go down into the counties and lecture to the people at the Mechanics' Institutes.

If they do assume this air, it is without any especial reason as the lectures themselves. The performances of the Earl of Carlisle and Lord John Russell in the Lyceum are not overwhelming for interest, information, or eloquence. They are as dry and didactic as the sermons of dyspeptic divines. And it is clear enough that the crowd is drawn together, not from any interest in the "Duties of Today," but in my Lord's opinion of that property, but simply to behold an Earl or a Duke in the flesh. The superior air of the speaker, which Mr. Adolphus Osborne complains of, is the reflection of the modesty air of the audience.

The Lyceum, as we understand it, has not yet rooted itself in England. There are Mechanic Institutes at which weekly lectures are delivered, but they are not popular lectures. When there is, the effect upon English social and political civilization will be as marked as it already is upon ours.

The Lyceum in this country, to-day, is very different from what it fifteen years ago. The themes discussed are less recondite. They come home to the thoughts and experience of the average mass of every audience. The audience, in fact, demands every year to be less and less amused, merely: but to be more and more instructed in a real way. It tolerates the boldest expression of thought, so it be true to be honest and calm; and it listens to more striking than to hear public speakers saying openly, and with patience, if not applause, on the part of the audience, what would have caused them to be suppressed eight or ten years ago.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER BOX.

BOSTON, November, 1858.

MR. LOUNGER,—I am desirous of adding a morsel to the weekly banquet which you provide, with so much taste, for the readers of Harper's Weekly. "CHICAGO, November, 1858.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—Thank your lucky stars, the Hog Interest is not represented to Chicago.

"Your piece of public resort will have a short respite, until the Hogs return from their feeding.

"In Chicago the genus Hog is now to be found in all parts of the city, except the Young Men's Association reading-room; time, 9 A.M., as witness the following:

"A gentleman entered the room and stretched open on the floor, and while engaged on one side thereof Mr. Hog entered from the other, and his position on the floor. The gentleman has probably nearly finished the column, and if course would soon turn it to a new page. Mr. Hog, with a true sense of politeness, has taken his position, and there will remain until the original reader has finished or Mr. Hog has discovered that there is room left on the success of his superior fleeting attitude.

"We are not well pleased with the name of the Hogs Long Hogs—that we think of promoting them with some more appropriate.

"Perhaps, Mr. Lounger, you would be kind enough to suggest something appropriate.

Yours, admiringly, CHICAGO.

—The Lounger would humbly suggest that a good family name for the new order would be an appropriate and appreciated a testimonial as any other. It is one, too, of the distinguishing traits of the country familiar with the family of Hogs would be profoundly interested. Should the ceremony take place in Chicago, may the Lounger upon "CHICAGO" to send him the details, which he will most gladly publish to the world.

—Persons writes from Vermont, enthusiastically of a good-looking Church's pictures, which, indeed, deserve enthusiastic praise:

"I am no connoisseur myself. I know nothing of criticism, and therefore I will attempt merely a very little in poetry. But living in Vermont, near the lake and mountains of this lovely land, I know what Nature is, and can be found in cities; and when I see Mr. Church's pictures I am satisfied. Nothing. This is truth. I know what it is, and I appreciate and do reverence accordingly. What a mercy-ground is this! I am delighted and satisfied beyond! What wonderful appreciation of sympathy and tenderness for all the myriad forms of nature!"

She then turns to Thackeray, whom she can not like:

"It is of no use for you men to defend Thackeray. With few exceptions, I am happy to say that the universal feminine world detests him. Ebenezer ne vend his and I firmly believe that this is the sole reason that he sneers at and disparages us poor, dear little beasts, as he condescendingly calls us."

The ladies are the Lounger's.

ARAB GIRLS AT SCHOOL, IN THE ESTABLISHMENT OF MADAME LUCE.

MODERN ALGIERS.

THE popular idea of Algiers, derived from books of travel and biographies of famous pirates, represents it as a place where corsairs hold their revels, where lovely young women are sold every day to the highest bidder at a few dollars a head, and where the Bashaw bowstrings a dozen Christians every morning before breakfast, just to satisfy himself of the stability of his religious principles. My fondest wish, in youth, was to go to Algiers on board a large man-of-war, which I had been taken to visit, and to blaze away at the place and people until not one stone was left upon another, and no bearded creatures stood on his legs to face me.

In fact, Algiers is a fair French town, not unlike Marseilles or Bordeaux, with French cafés, French shops, French liquors, French soldiers, French costumes, and French grisettes. The aboriginal population exists, it is true; but glory has departed from them, and absinthe and other French institutions ruin the day. In a few years there will be nothing Algerian about Algiers—nothing Moorish about the old strong-hold of the old Moorish freebooters. Musulmen and Jew are both slowly fading away before the irresistible Frenchman.

Our illustrations may be regarded as embalming a society which will soon be a thing of the past. One of them represents a couple of Moorish ladies overtaken in a rain-storm. Rain is a rare occurrence at Algiers. For eleven of the twelve months, on an average, the sky is clear, and the native ladies can carry on their flirtations and gossip upon the roofs of their houses under the canopy of heaven. But it does rain sometimes, and then 'tis a painful sight to see the poor Moorish ladies struggling through the mire. Their dress, to male eyes, seems to consist of innumerable folds of cotton or linen wound round and round head, body, and limbs; there are so many folds that under a fair shower of rain the wearer runs some risk of being washed AWAY. A late traveler tells a story of a very virtuous Moorish lady who was overtaken in so heavy a storm that even her yashmak was washed off her face, and she was forced to walk through several streets with her features exposed to the public gaze. She bore it patiently for a while, but after a time the indignity was too terrible for her feelings. Rushing through a crowded street to a wharf, she plunged into the Mediterranean, deeming death a fit expiation for her accident.

MOORISH LADIES IN A STORM.

Another of our engravings represents a female school in Algiers. This school, which has already become famous, is directed by a hero-

WOMEN OF THE OULED-RIAH TRIBE.

...e of the name of Madame Luce. She was one of the first French settlers in Algiers, and many years ago she conceived the project of educating the Arab and Moorish girls of the city. Obstacles and difficulties beset her on every side. The French Government regarded the female sex as a necessity in the economy of the human race, but save no reason why any pains should be taken to educate females. The Emperor would give no money to Madame Luce; he would not protect her against her enemies. Finding that without Government protection she could not struggle against the difficulties of her task, this noble-hearted woman converted all her private property into money, even pawned her gold thimble, and went to Paris to see Napoleon. She succeeded in obtaining an interview, and in the few minutes which were granted to her, she spoke so sensibly and so forcibly that she obtained what she had sought—first, the protection of the French soldiery; next, an allowance from Government for her school. On her return from France it was reopened with éclat. As soon as it was known that the Government was on her side, everybody hastened to send his daughters to Madame Luce's establishment; and now, we are told, she has as many pupils as may be seen in any of our common schools. Her system is excellent. She teaches sewing of all kinds, reading, writing, arithmetic, history, and geography; she does not interfere with the religious views of her scholars. The Jewish girls pray after their fashion, the Mussulmans girls have the Koran read to them, the Christians read the Bible and their devotional works. Some of Madame Luce's pupils have already done her credit. One of the most worthily-earned prizes at the late Paris Exhibition was bestowed on a deaf and dumb Arab girl, who was educated by Madame Luce, for samples of embroidery.

Our two other illustrations represent the Kabyle boys, who are the porters and waiters at the hotels and cafés of Algiers, and the Ouled-Riah women. The Ouled-Riahs are an old Arab tribe which for many years successfully resisted the attempts of the French to subjugate them. Nestled in their mountain fastnesses, they were almost inaccessible, and when they sallied forth from their haunts in search of plunder or battle, they generally contrived to measure their time correctly that they were sure to succeed. The Ouled-Riahs as a tribe were crushed out, twelve years ago, by the present Duke of Malakoff, French Ambassador to England, then plain Colonel Pelissier. The terrible story of the final extinction of the clan was thus told by the Akhbar of Algiers, of the 5th July, 1845:

"Colonel Pelissier was busy in pursuing the Ouled-Riahs, who have never yet submitted, as they dwell in immense caverns, which it would be madness for the troops to enter. On the 18th of June, being closely pursued, the Ouled-Riahs fled to their usual place of refuge. After having surrounded the caverns, fagots were lighted and thrown by the French troops before the entrance. This demonstration was made to convince the Arabs that the French had the power, if they pleased, of suffocating them in their hiding-places. Then the Colonel threw in letters, offering them life and liberty if they would surrender their arms and their horses. At first they refused, but subsequently replied they would consult the French troops would withdraw. This condition was not accepted, and more burning fagots were thrown in. A great tumult now arose from a discussion as to whether there should be a surrender or not. The party opposed to a surrender carried their point, and a few of the inmates escaped. Colonel Pelissier, wishing to spare the lives of those who remained in the cavern, sent some Arabs to exhort them to surrender. They refused, and a few women, who did not partake of the savage fanaticism of the majority, attempted to fly, but their husbands and relations fired upon them to prevent their escape from the martyrdom. Colonel Pelissier then suspended the throwing of the burning fagots, and sent a French officer to hold a parley with the Ouled-Riahs, but his messenger was received with a discharge of fire-arms, and could not perform his mission. This state of things continued till the night of the 19th, when, losing all patience and all hope of subduing these fanatics, who formed a perpetual nucleus of revolt in the country, the flames converted and rendered intense. During this time the shrieks of the unhappy wretches who were being suffocated were dreadful, and then nothing was heard but the crackling of the fagots. This silence spoke volumes. The troops entered, and found five hundred dead bodies. About one hundred and fifty, who still breathed, were brought into the fresh air, but a portion of them expired afterward."

PART OF THE REMAINS OF FORT PITT, SKETCHED IN JANUARY, 1854.

THE CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION AT PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA.

ON Thursday last the people of Pittsburgh and the vicinity assembled to celebrate a memorable event. One hundred years ago, on the 25th November, the fort which bore the name of Fort Duquesne, and which stood on the site of the present railroad depôt at Pittsburgh, was taken from the French by the Provincial and regular troops under General Forbes; and thus the French scheme of domination on this continent was overthrown, and the supremacy of the Anglo-Saxon element was forever secured.

The point where the Monongahela and Allegheny rivers blend their waters to form the Ohio was pointed out, in the middle of the last century, by both French and English engineers as a commanding site for a fort. Accordingly, in January of 1754, when the great struggle began for the control of the lakes and the valleys of the Mississippi and Ohio, that point was contended for by both parties. The French had built forts at Erie, Waterford, French Creek, and Venango (these names, of course, were given to the sites long afterward); the Virginians under Governor Dinwiddie, and acting in concert with the Ohio Company, a trading corporation, directed Major Washington to raise two hundred men, and to erect a fort at the junction of the Monongahela and Alleghany rivers. The duty of breaking ground at the site was deferred to the second in command, Captain Trent, who arrived on the spot in March, 1754. On 7th April following he was attacked by a body of 1000 men, mostly Indians, under Monsieur Contrecœur, and forced to evacuate the place. The French continued the works he had begun, and on the completion of the fort gave to it the name of Fort Duquesne.

Every one remembers that it was to recover that post that the miserable expedition of Braddock was undertaken. The fort would probably have fallen into the hands of the British had the expeditionary force reached it, for the French commander had resolved to surrender. Luckily for him, the skilful attack of Captain Beaujeu's command, and the stupidity of Braddock, saved him the disgrace; and for some time longer the fort remained in the hands of the French.

When William Pitt took office one of his first aims was the recovery of Fort Duquesne. He saw that so long as the French held that point the British colonies on the sea-board would be unsafe. He accordingly gave directions to fit out an army under General Forbes, and took measures to obviate the errors which had proved fatal to General Braddock. General Forbes set out too late in the season, and but for a series of accidents which dispirited the French, he would have shared the fate of his predecessor. Luckily for him, the French tried to repeat the manœuvre they had played against Braddock; a corps d'armée sallied forth and attacked Colonel Boquet's force, which was some days' journey in advance of the main army; the English won the day; and the Indians, as usual after a defeat, fled, leaving the allies to make the best of the disaster. This accident so disheartened the garrison of the fort that, as the main army under Forbes approached, they evacuated it, and burned the buildings to the ground. On 25th November, 1758, Colonel Washington encamped on the site, which was covered with ashes and burning timbers strewed around the remains of thirty tall chimneys.

It is this memorable event which the Pennsylvanians celebrated on Thursday. One of our engravings represents the railroad depôt, which stands as nearly as possible on the site of the old fort. The other, which is taken from a painting in the possession of the distinguished amateur, Mr. John M. Falconer, represents a part of the fort which was built by the English on the site of Fort Duquesne. After the reoccupation of the point by the army under Forbes, a new fort was built under the directions of Colonel Boquet, and named Fort Pitt. After the peace a town grew around this fort, and borrowed from it its name—Pittsburgh. Stores and buildings gradually encroached upon the old fortifications, and at length effaced them altogether. In January, 1854, Mr. Falconer endeavored to trace out its walls, but was unable.

He discovered, however, a part of some of the old buildings, and painted them. Our engraving is taken from his picture.

LITERARY.

IT has been a work of pious affection for Dr. Strickland to prepare THE LIFE OF FRANCIS ASBURY, the pioneer Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America, and he has produced such a book as might have been anticipated from the man and the subject. (Carlton & Porter, publishers.) It is no ordinary biography. We have the story of his life and his work here; and we follow him from his first boy-sermons (for he was a boy when he began to preach) in England to the consecration of himself to mission work in America—on shipboard, where we find him preaching, lashed to the mast in a gale of wind—into American forests—up and down the country, in all seasons and all weather, working like a man who was in earnest, sowing the seed in all parts of the land, and beholding the fruit with his own eyes before he was gathered to the fathers. Bishop Asbury's life is full of interest to all who would study the character of a faithful, self-denying minister of God's Word. Dr. Strickland has brought out very clearly the self-sacrificing character of his hero—for that he was a hero no one who reads the book will doubt or deny. With abilities that might command any situation in life, with powerful friends, whom he made for himself in every part of the country, he preferred the itinerant life of labor which he began in his youth, and which he never left off until he was stopped in the midst of his journeying by the call of the dread messenger. He had and he hoped for no reward here. He lived as a sojourner seeking a better country. We say he had no reward. Perhaps he felt that it was enough to see Methodism growing up in America under his fostering care, until the despised few who worshiped in the old William Street loft, in New York, had become the nation of Methodists, whose hymns and prayers ascended from every valley east of the Mississippi. Perhaps it was a reward worth living for, and in the end dying for, to know that through his labors, in a very large degree, the Methodist Church had attained a position of influence and strength, and a hold on the affections of the community, second to no Church in America. This, indeed, he had for his consolation; and in this view Dr. Strickland's book ranks among the important contributions of the day to religious history.

From Mr. J. K. Curtis, 83 Bleecker Street, we have received a work which, at the first glance, might strike the reader as a great waste of paper, but which, on examination, proves to be a remarkably interesting and valuable book. It is AN ARRANGEMENT OF TRADESMEN'S CARDS, POLITICAL TOKENS, ELECTION MEDALS, MEDALETS, etc., current in this country for the last sixty years, by Charles J. Bushnell, Esq., of this city, who is well known as one of the most assiduous and careful collectors of American coins and medals. The cui bono question which is put by most persons who examine this curious catalogue has its answer in the same way that all such questions directed to historical and genealogical subjects are answered. Of these medalets a vast majority are of no present importance; but many of them are already of much interest, and all of them will become so in time. To collectors, of course, Mr. Bushnell's work will commend itself as a careful and accurate catalogue; while we are persuaded that a great many who are interested in antiquarian subjects, but who have not devoted any attention to this branch, will be interested and gratified by an examination of the book before us. The work is but the commencement of Mr. Bushnell's enterprise. He proposes to bring out a further issue on American coins, which will possess much more general value than the part now before us. The two together will be the first complete work on American Numismatics; and the next generation will thank the accomplished author for his labors, if this one does not. The work is illustrated with examples of some of the most interesting tokens, first among which are the tokens of Motts, jewelers, issued in New York in 1789, and Talbot, Allum, & Lee, shipping merchants in this city, issued in 1794, and again in 1795. The latter, a copper token of the size of a penny, brings now at auction sales from two to three dollars—so rare has it become.

EVERY WOMAN HER OWN LAWYER, published by Dick & Fitzgerald, is one of those books which we have frequently condemned. If any woman attempts to be her own lawyer with the aid of this book she will need more lawyers than New York can supply to rectify the blunders she will make.

Peterson publishes THE FOUR SISTERS, by Miss Bremer, translated by Mary Howitt. The Swedish lady dedicates the book to the memory of Downing. We have not had time to examine it; nor will the admirers of Miss Bremer wait for any opinion on its merits.

PLAIN WORDS TO YOUNG MEN, by Augustus Woodbury, published in Concord by E. C. Eastman, belongs to a class of works, not uncommon of late, whose aim is to reach the morals and the manners of young men at one hit. Mr. Woodbury writes frankly, heartily, and with force and feeling.

We have heretofore noticed with favor Mrs. Hornby's IN AND AROUND STAMBOUL, which is now republished by James Challen & Son, Philadelphia. Few modern books of travel have been received with so much praise in England. The book is gossipy, most emphatically readable, contains all sorts of talk and twaddle about Constantinople and the Turks, and if it should ever happen to be translated into Turkish for Eastern readers, will make it somewhat unsafe for Mrs. Hornby to venture her little head on the banks of the Bosporus, where sacks and caiques are not wholly out of vogue, even under the mild rule of Abdul Medjid.

ISABELLA ORSINI, published by Rudd & Carleton, is another novel of the Beatrice Cenci sort, unreadable, unintelligible, and abominable.

We are glad to see a new edition of the sacred writings of the Mormons. James O. Wright & Co. publish THE BOOK OF MORMON, which is the Bible of those fanatical people. With the history of the production of these stupid yet ingenious writings our readers are familiar. A glance at the book will not harm any one, and the curious will be glad to possess and examine it carefully.

JACK AND HARRY, or Pictures for the Young, by Mary and John Howitt, is an elegant book for the small folks, published by J. E. Tilton & Co., Boston, and calculated to elicit shouts of delight in the nursery. The illustrations are large, and excellently designed for young capacities of enjoyment, while the text is too well known to need comment.

We have to regret the want of space for a fuller notice than we are obliged to give of Dr. Sprague's fifth volume of ANNALS OF THE AMERICAN PULPIT, published by Carter & Brothers. This volume is devoted to the Episcopalian clergymen, and fully sustains the high reputation for accuracy and correctness, as well as for interest and value, which the former volumes had established. The plan of Dr. Sprague possesses especial attractions. Instead of a general biographical encyclopedia, written in uniform style and by one hand, we have here judicious, careful, and reliable digests of biography, nearly every one of which is accompanied by one or more letters from personal acquaintances of the subject of the memoir, or from persons who have had opportunities for special knowledge of his life and character. These letters are among the most attractive features of the volume, as of the former, and add ten-fold to its value as a historical work, while we are not to be understood as insinuating that the work of Dr. Sprague's own pen is any less readable or valuable. The series may challenge comparison with any biographical works extant. We call the attention of our readers in the country to this set of works, as most admirably suited for presents to pastors, and as works which, in every house, will prove inexhaustible funds of instruction, interest, and worthy example for children growing up to maturity.

A book, by Professor H. F. Massmann, the old "Turnmeister," has been published at Berlin, entitled THE HIGH SCHOOL: A Dream—[Die hohe Schule. Ein Traum.] It abounds in anecdote of the German Professors, of which this is a specimen:

"Professor Thomas Haselbach, of Vienna, lectured publicly for twenty-two years on the first chapter of Isaiah, without ever having come to an end; his colleague and admirer, Aegidius Guthmann, divided his lectures on the first five verses of Genesis into twenty-four volumes. Crusius lectured eight years on the Psalms, without going through the first half. Petrus Pontanus used to chalk on the doors of his lecture-room, when he was in his cups, a group of P's, which meant, Petrus Pontanus, Professor Publicus, Propter Pocula Prohibetur Prælegere. Eobanus Hesse took a pitcher of wine with him into the pulpit, drinking a mouthful at every fine passage of the poet on whom he was lecturing, till at last every passage appeared fine to him. Friedrich August Wolf, at Berlin, when he had no mind to lecture, or wanted to work for himself, used to put up a bill in his lecture-room, with the words, 'I shall be ill for a week.' Professor Walch, at Göttingen, on the contrary, fell really ill during the vacations, because he could not then read to his auditory."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE Message of Governor Allston to the Legislature of South Carolina was delivered on 23d ult. The message is conservative in tone, concise, and well written. It calls the attention of the Legislature to the duty of electing a United States Senator in the place of Senator Evans; refers in terms of congratulation to the progress of the railroads and other internal improvements of the State; recommends the investment of Southern capital more in Southern improvements and less in Northern securities; refers in terms of disapproval to incendiary resolutions against slavery by the free State Legislatures, declaring such resolutions undeserving of a response, and exhorting the States to cultivate moral virtues, industrious domestic habits, and to observe scrupulously all the federal obligations. He then refers to the recent slaver cases, as presenting in strong relief the devotion to law and order of the people of South Carolina, but expresses regret at their occurrence, as productive of unwonted excitements. He questions the propriety of interfering in such a manner with the commerce of the inhabitants of Cuba, and expresses the belief that while the navy of the United States may, under the Constitution, be charged with preventing a slave-trade between the coast of Africa and our own shores, it is policy to let foreign nations regulate their own affairs and enforce their own police. The remainder of the Message is confined to State policy, recommending, among other things, a repeal of the usury laws.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF INDIANA.

The Message of Governor Willard was delivered last week. It is very brief, and confined exclusively to the causes that rendered the extra session of the Legislature necessary. He animadverted to some length upon the failure of the last Legislature to make appropriations for the maintenance of the State officers, the State institutions, and for the payment of the interest of the State debt. He urged the immediate action of the present Assembly upon these important subjects. He further recommended the erection of another State Prison in the northern part of the State, and concluded by expressing the hope "that wisdom and patriotism would guide the action" of those he addressed.

THE CASE OF THE INDIANA SENATORS.

Both Houses of the Indiana Legislature have adopted resolutions declaring the election of Messrs. Bright and Fitch, United States Senators from that State, illegal, unconstitutional, and void. As the dispute about these Senators will be apt to lead to discussion during the next session of Congress, the following explanation of the state of the case, from the Herald, will be found interesting and useful: When the Nebraska Bill was passed, in 1854, both the Indiana Senators (Messrs. Bright and Pettit) were Administration Democrats, and supported it. Mr. Pettit's term expired in 1855; Mr. Bright's in 1857. The Indiana Legislature only meets biennially. At its next meeting after the passage of the bill there was a Nebraska majority in one House, but an anti-Nebraska majority in the other and on joint ballot. The Nebraska men succeeded, however, in preventing a joint Convention, so nothing was done, and Pettit's seat remained vacant. At the next meeting of the Legislature, two years after, a similar opposition between the Houses bid fair to lead to a similar result. But the Democrats procured a joint Convention, with a Democratic majority in it, which re-elected Mr. Bright, and elected Dr. Fitch to fill the vacant seat of Mr. Pettit. A formal protest was made at Washington. The new Legislature just elected has taken the matter in hand, and the result is the adoption of the resolution before mentioned.

BRIGHAM YOUNG'S SONS IN TROUBLE.

The editor of the St. Joseph Journal has been shown a letter from David H. Burr, Esq., late Surveyor-General of Utah, to Mr. Hockaday, dated October 22, from which we make the following extract to show how matters are progressing in the Holy Valley:

"The Mormons are tolerably quiet at present, though occasionally they show the cloven foot. Yesterday, Joe and Brigham Young (sons of the Prophet) went into Gilbert & Gerrish's store and were impudent to Gilbert, when he collared them and summarily ejected them from his store. Joe got on his horse, and, drawing his revolver, attempted to ride in and shoot Gilbert, but Brigham, being a little more discreet, prevented him. A crowd gathered around, revolvers were drawn, and a trifle then would have produced a collision. If Joe had not been stopped he would certainly have been shot. Some Mormons went then and arrested them both, pretending to take them to the calaboose."

GAMBLING AND GAMBLERS AT WASHINGTON.

The Daily Times has a letter from Washington on Pendleton's death. The writer says: "I need hardly say that the stories afloat of Pendleton's having lost $180,000 in one sitting, and other like pieces of poetry, are mere rosy fictions. I do not believe that, either at Pendleton's or any other faro bank, here or in New York, $10,000 was ever lost or won at one sitting. The capital with which a bank opens a game here never exceeds $10,000, and on suffering a loss of $5000—a matter of rare occurrence—the bank generally closes for the night. At Crockford's £5000 was the limit of loss, and he never allowed it to go beyond. There is a story, somewhat uncertain, of a Western contractor having lost $8000 at Pendleton's, but this is the largest sum even fable ascribes to his faro bank. As a rule, the wealth and winnings of gamblers are highly colored. With the exception of one or two in New York, there is no gambler, either at the political or commercial capital, possessed of any amount of wealth. The odds at faro in favor of the bank, as calculated by the keenest players at Baden, is, here as there, 2¼ per cent.; and their advantage lies, far more than on this percentage, in that feature in players' natures which, in their losing luck, forces them, in the hope of regaining, to lose more and more, until they reach a heavy loss, whereas they seldom have the daring to take full advantage of a favoring fortune. Pendleton, though for the last two years, as he neared the verge of the grave, he tried to grasp every thing on the margin, died worth only $38,000. Of this sum he bequeathed three-fourths to his wife, and the other to his mother for her life, with remainder to some relatives.

THE GAMBLER'S WIFE AND THE PRESIDENT.

"His wife, the daughter of Mr. Mills, the builder of the Capitol, with whom Pendleton ran away early in his career, and who naturally shared to some degree the notoriety of her husband, is a woman of much personal and mental charm, and has always been treated here with as much attention as possible, considering the circumstances of her position. She is said to have carried on a considerable correspondence with Mr. Buchanan, and since her husband's death the President is known to have paid her a visit of condolence, and expressed his regret that he was not aware of the day fixed for her husband's funeral, or he should have attended as a mark of his respect.

PENDLETON'S POLITICAL INFLUENCE.

"That Pendleton had much influence in political matters, or ventured to exercise any, I do not believe. He probably attained his highest ambition in this direction when dispatched as delegate from the capital to the Cincinnati Convention. But in the lobby he was a power, and wielded more influence than any single individual, even Thurlow Weed, could command. He held a large number of Congressmen (and those of the loosest and most unprincipled class), and even a stray Senator or so, in the iron wrench of pecuniary obligation, and when a fat contract had to be carried, or foul job lobbyed through, no huntsman ever brought his pack up to their work with a severer leash. His influence may be judged from the fact that when, some time since, the keen and crafty proprietor of perhaps the largest commercial steam fleet in the world, and one not in the habit of taking a false measure of men, had occasion for a visit to Washington, his first move was to make Pendleton a present of a pair of carriage-horses, and he fed at his table every day. It is also a fact that a gentleman who went to Washington to obtain the return of a large amount of duty, paid Pendleton $10,000 for his interest. A few weeks faro, and a Congressman is cleaned out. Where does he then dine?—At Pendleton's. Where does he drink?—At Pendleton's. When he needs money, perhaps to return home, where does he mortgage his mileage?—At Pendleton's. He belongs to Pendleton. 'Is not Evelyn true?'

OTHER WASHINGTON GAMBLING HELLS.

"Next in rank to Pendleton was and is Pringle's, some doors below the National, on the Avenue. The proprietor himself passes the greater part of his time in a drunken dream, from which he seldom wakes; when he does, he is quiet, gentlemanly, and reserved, with a range of knowledge bounded on every side by faro. The house is remarkable for having two sets of employés, one for day and one for night, the game being eternal. Breakfast, lunches, dinners, and suppers are served in constant succession, and devoured by crowds of hungry Southern and Western men.

"Next in order, within two doors of Pringle's, comes the Virginia House. The visitors here are made up of some who visit one house, some the other, and some few who visit this exclusively—the latter principally Virginians. Though the faro case here does not represent perpetual motion, as at Pringle's, they never lose a chance, are prepared at all hours, and never leave the house except to shave. The entertainments, though not directed by a delicate taste, are very good.

'One after one the Lords of Time advance.'

Next, and last, comes Monteiro, a Virginian of Spanish extraction, who deals at the 'Corner House,' opposite the National. This house is, perhaps, the nicest in Washington, and is almost exclusively patronized by the Legations. The suppers, as compared with the others, are gay and graceful, and the appearance of the young attachés of an evening, in full-dress and white tie, after one of the diplomatic dinners which follow each other in the season with the rapidity of the celebrated fruits in the enchanted garden,

'Scarce one is gathered ere another grows,' gives a perfumed air to the rather dingy apartments, which is pleasant. There are, besides, a herd of small cattle of no account."

DEATH OF HON. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER.

Letters from Paris announce the death, in that city, Nov. 8, of the Hon. Benjamin F. Butler, of this city. His disease was diabetes. The Times thus epitomizes his biography: "He was born at Kinderhook, in this State, in December, 1795. He studied law with Ex-President Van Buren, and when admitted to practice, became his partner. Mr. Butler served with credit in the State Assembly, was afterward associated with Judge Duer and John C. Spencer in the work of revising the Statutes, and became Attorney-General of the United States during the Presidency of General Jackson. Subsequently, he was appointed United States District Attorney for the Southern District of New York. Mr. Butler took an active part in politics, was a warm supporter of the doctrines of the Democratic party for many years, but in 1847–'48 bolted with the Barnburners, under the lead of John Van Buren, and entered with great zeal into the exciting Presidential canvass of that period. When the new party, however, retraced its steps in 1850–'51, Mr. Butler stood aloof, took no part with his former political associates, and became a strenuous opponent of the Kansas-Nebraska Pro-Slavery movement. Latterly he had withdrawn from public life, but his Free-Soil tendencies remained unaltered. His devotion to professional engagements having seriously impaired his health, he left the city in October last on a voyage to Europe, hoping for a restoration of his energies. He arrived in Paris, Nov. 3, and died there Nov. 8. Mr. Butler was an active supporter of charitable enterprises and a man of urbane manners."

A CLERGYMAN SUING FOR HIS SALARY.

A suit was tried in the Circuit Court last week, before Judge Emott and a jury, in which the Rev. David J. Patterson appeared as plaintiff, and the First Reformed Dutch Church as defendants. The suit was brought to recover six months' salary, due on the 1st of July, 1858. The defense set up a plea that the Society was not an incorporated body, and, therefore, could make no legal agreement for pastor's salary, and also that the services were not worth the amount claimed. The jury, after hearing all of the circumstances in the case, rendered a verdict for plaintiff, awarding $392 68—the full amount claimed.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE ATLANTIC CABLE.

A VESSEL, it appears, has arrived at Valentia with seven miles of the shore end of the cable on board. She is called the Stag, and Captain Kell, her commander, is making arrangements to lay this portion of the wire with all possible speed. In connection with the arrival of the Stag at Valentia, the Munster News says: "There is one rather dangerous reef of rocks lying about one mile and a half or two miles outside the mouth of Valentia harbor, called the Coast Guard Patch. On this rock there are about ten fathoms at low water, and about twenty-six fathoms all round it. Unfortunately, as the Agamemnon entered the harbor, owing to the wind being unfavorable, she was obliged to lay the cable over this spot. It is thought that the drifting of the cable over this place might have partially caused the injury which has stopped the working for so long a period. From this point it will, of course, be removed, and deposited in the most secure and level channel in the harbor. With the view of discovering such a channel, Captain Kell has, for the last few days, been closely sounding every approach to the bay, both on the Valentia and the Lough Kay side of the Beginish Island. As there is already between four and five miles of the shore end of the cable laid down, the additional seven miles which will be added to it by Captain Kell will render the rope quite secure against any injury from the wash of the tide. It is understood that Mr. Henley, whose powerful magnetic-electric machines have for some time been used at Valentia, has undertaken to superintend the electric operations at Valentia for a short period."

The London Times recommends the use of the Hughes instrument.

THE LAST FROM MR. WHITEHOUSE.

Mr. Whitehouse, the electrician, has published a reply to the last and curt epistle of the secretary to the Atlantic Telegraph Company, in which he declares that recent experiments upon a faulty piece of cable raised from the harbor of Valentia have satisfied him that the system of testing hitherto relied upon is to the last degree fallacious and inconclusive. He adds that, during his recent stay at Valentia, he learned that on one occasion, after the official messages had been worked off, the superintendent at Newfoundland gave the clerks permission to amuse themselves by sending currents through the cable. Being free from responsibility for any errors arising from haste, they worked Mr. Whitehouse's apparatus with unusual rapidity, and the clerks at Valentia received perfect signals while this was going on. Mr. Whitehouse asserts that the conversation was kept up in full words by the aid of Thomson's galvanometer. This statement is so extraordinary that we are almost constrained to suppose Mr. Whitehouse has been deceived. Practical telegraphers, on the other hand, are of opinion that, in reading the last message, the powerful imagination of the clerks was more serviceable than the delicate needles and reflector of Mr. Thomson. So confident, however, is Mr. Whitehouse of the accuracy of his information that he makes it the basis of a series of calculations. These lead him to form the hopeful opinion that, after paying all necessary working expenses, and laying aside £50,000 in the first year as a reserve, there will be a margin of receipts by the transmission of messages through the present defective cable amply sufficient to pay all shareholders ten per cent.

ALMOST A FRENCH INVASION.

The Cork Reporter tells the following story: "The inhabitants not alone of Queenstown, but of the entire surrounding country, were on Tuesday night dreadfully alarmed by being startled from their peaceful slumbers by a powerful cannonade from one of the war-ships in the harbor. The consternation was increased by its being after the hour for firing signals, and by the cannonade being irregular and long continued. The first impression that arose from this most extraordinary occurrence was that some hostile squadron had, under cover of the darkness, endeavored to surprise the port. It was soon found, however, that the cause of alarm proceeded from the Hawk, the captain and first lieutenant of which were on shore at the time. It was 10 o'clock, and the second lieutenant, from what inspiration remains to be discovered, conceived the idea of piping all hands on deck and putting them through the evolutions of defense consequent upon being surprised by an enemy. The captain of the Hawk, and soon after him the admiral of the port, hastened on board, and after the gentleman had been about half an hour 'surprising the natives,' put an end to his sport. In order to ascertain the entire of the facts of this most unaccountable proceeding, we dispatched a reporter to Queenstown, to learn them at the Admiralty House, but the functionaries there seemed to make light of the matter, and were unwilling to give information. It is stated generally that the gentleman was not in such a state as to understand fully the nature of what he was doing, and that he has been put under restraint to await an investigation into his motives for placing Queenstown in a 'state of siege.' We have just learned that the officer in question has been in the service for some years in China, and has returned in ill-health, which probably has occasioned this strange conduct"

SPORT INDEED!

A court authority says: "His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge lately went on a visit to his Grace the Duke of Rutland, and shot over the park preserves, in which 435 pheasants, 56 partridges, 54 hares, 18 rabbits, and one woodcock were killed. On the following day his Royal Highness, the Duke of Rutland, and Lord G. Manners bagged 245 pheasants, 68 partridges, 73 hares, and 26 rabbits, in four hours, in the Links preserves. The game killed by his Grace and friends, with an average of three guns a day, for upward of a fortnight, is 857 pheasants, 2700 partridges, 690 hares, 129 rabbits, and 2 woodcocks; and the bag made by Mr. Bell, the park-keeper, during September, as presents for the tenants, etc., were 5082 head, which, in consequence of the unusual abundance of game, is scarcely missed."

GAVAZZI AND OLIVER CROMWELL.

Signor Gavazzi delivered an eloquent lecture, on 2d November, at Manchester, upon "Oliver Cromwell," discussing his merits in the threefold capacity of politician, warrior, and Christian, and pronouncing him to be, on the whole, the greatest man that England has ever produced. At the close of the lecture, some of the audience, unasked, tendered subscriptions to the lecturer for the purpose of aiding to raise a national monument to the great Puritan hero, and a committee was appointed to assist in carrying out the object.

WHOLESALE POISONING WITH LOZENGES.

It appears that a person named Neale, a wholesale confectioner at Bradford, England, has been in the habit of mixing a large quantity of plaster of Paris with peppermint lozenges, as a substitute for ground sugar—twelve pounds of the plaster to forty pounds weight of sugar. This lozenge-maker was in collusion with a Mr. Hodgson, of the same place, a druggist. To disguise the knavery, the two tradesmen, in their dealings, called the plaster "daft" or "alibi," and the confectioner's messenger went to the druggist's shop for the material thus designated. A few days since a raw apprentice, in the service of the druggist, unacquainted with the password, went up stairs to his master, who was ill in bed, to ask for instructions, and was told to proceed to the cellar for twelve pounds of "daft," in a corner of which he would find a cask containing the material. In the cellar he found two casks, one containing "daft" the other arsenic, and the boy served Neale with arsenic instead of plaster of Paris. A retail dealer, named Hardaker, bought a considerable quantity of this abominable mixture, sold the lozenges in the market-place of Bradford, and the result was the fearful and wholesale poisoning of from 150 to 200 persons. Glaring, rank dishonesty has been the cause of the calamity—the determination of Neale to undersell his honest competitors.

NARROW ESCAPE OF BEING BURIED ALIVE.

A sensation has been caused at Nuneaton, Warwickshire, in consequence of a young woman of that place having come to life after her apparent death. Preparations were made for "laying her out," the bell tolled, and the shutters were closed; but in a few hours after her supposed death she became warm, and ultimately convalescent. She states that during the time she was in the trance she could distinctly hear the conversation of those near her.

CAN A WOMAN BE A SEAMAN?

In an action for wages by a steward and stewardess of an American vessel, a delicate question arose, on the 2d, in the London Court of Common Pleas. The Lord Chief Justice said that part of the claim was for wages for the plaintiff's wife, and she could hardly come under the Merchant Seaman's Act. Mr. Jones, a counsel learned in the law, submitted that the terms of the Act would not only apply to seamen but to seawomen as well, because she had signed articles, and would, therefore, according to the Act, be a seaman. There was much laughter during this argument, and at the conclusion the Court said it must take time to look into the authorities upon the subject.

THE WIFE OF THREE MEN.

The Hampshire Independent says that a charge of bigamy has recently been heard at the Town Hall, Southampton, which revealed transactions of a most extraordinary kind. The facts are as follows: Some years ago a man named Collins was married to a woman at Fisherton Church, Salisbury. For being concerned in some machine riots Collins was transported within a few weeks of the birth of his daughter. A short time after Collins's banishment his wife marries another man (as she did not like single blessedness) named Kemish. When Collins's daughter had grown up to womanhood Kemish takes a fancy to her, and by agreement with the mother, who had for years been styled Mrs. Kemish, he marries the daughter at the same church at which the mother had been married to Collins, and at the same time and place at which Kemish marries the daughter (after, it must be recollected, he had been married to the mother many years), the mother, Mrs. Collins, alias Kemish, was actually married to a man named Pitt; so that the woman Collins has married three men—Collins, Kemish, and Pitt; and Kemish has married both mother and daughter; and Pitt finds out that the woman he now has is not his wife. Kemish and the woman Pitt, Kemish, or Collins, are both bailed to appear for their trial at the next assizes.

DEATH FROM SKINNING A SQUIRREL.

The Worcester Herald says: "A few days ago, at Bewdley, a child about nine years of age, named Michael Holder, was amusing himself with cutting up a dead squirrel that was in a putrid state, when the virus in the flesh inoculated his system through a slight wound on his finger, or a wart upon the hand. So active was the poison that it baffled the best medical advice, and after lingering in great agony for many days death terminated his sufferings."

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR ON THE SLAVE-TRADE.

The Moniteur publishes the following letter, which the Emperor has addressed to his cousin, Prince Napoleon, Minister of Algeria and the Colonies:

"ST. CLOUD, Oct. 30, 1858.

"MY DEAR COUSIN,—I have the liveliest desire that, at the moment when the differences with Portugal relative to the Charles-Georges have terminated, the question of the engagement of free laborers on the African coast should be definitively examined, and finally settled on the truest principles of humanity and justice.

"I energetically claimed from Portugal the restitution of the Charles-Georges, because I will always maintain intact the independence of the national flag; but in this case even it was only with the profound conviction of my right that I risked with the King of Portugal a rupture of those friendly relations which I am glad to maintain with him.

"But as to the principle of the engagement of the negroes my ideas are far from being settled. If, in truth, laborers recruited on the African coast are not allowed the exercise of their free-will, and if this enrollment is only the slave-trade in disguise, I will have it on no terms; for it is not I who will any where protect enterprises contrary to progress, to humanity, and to civilization.

"I beg you, then, to seek out the truth with the zeal and intelligence which you bring to bear on all affairs about which you employ yourself.

"And as the best method of putting a term to what is a continual cause of dispute would be to substitute the free labor of Indian coolies for that of the negroes, I beg you to come to an understanding with the Minister for Foreign Affairs to resume with the English Government the negotiations which were entered upon a few months ago.

"On this, my dear cousin, I pray God to have you in his holy keeping. NAPOLEON."

LAMARTINE GOING INTO EXILE.

Poor Lamartine quits his patrimonial estate next week, and the property which he trusted in vain to public liberality to enable him to save will be sold under a judge's order. It is understood that, after taking farewell of his Paris friends, the ruined poet and politician, who bitterly feels the cold comfort to which he has been treated by his countrymen, will cross the Channel and reside henceforth in England.

RACHEL'S TOMB.

Galignani has the following: "The approach of the 2d of November, the day devoted by the Catholic religion to the memory of the dead, occasions great activity in the different cemeteries at Paris, in order to have the tombs in course of erection completed by that day. Among those which have been recently terminated is that of Mademoiselle Rachel, at Père-la-Chaise. It is on the right on entering the part of the ground appropriated to the Israelites. It is a small chapel in the Greek style, over the door of which the word 'Rachel' is carved, with two crowns and a diadem. There are also two corbeilles in stone, highly polished and filled with flowers. The tomb of Alfred de Musset has also been just finished. A marble bust of the deceased is placed on the monument and a weeping willow planted in front of it, while on the eastern side is engraved a verse from his works, in which he speaks of that tree, and expresses a wish to have one planted near his last resting-place. Workmen are also employed in constructing the mausoleum of the Queen of Oude."

DEATH OF A DWARF.

We read in Galignani: "A dwarf named Richebourg, who was only 60 centimetres (23½ inches) high, has just died in the Rue du Four St. Germain, aged ninety. He was, when young, in the service of the Duchess d'Orleans, mother of King Louis Philippe, with title of 'butler,' but he performed none of the duties of the office. After the first revolution broke out he was employed to convey dispatches abroad, and, for that purpose, was dressed as a baby, the dispatches being concealed in his cap, and a nurse being made to carry him. For the last twenty-five years he lived in the Rue du Four, and during all that time never went out. He had a great repugnance to strangers, and was alarmed when he heard the voice of one; but, in his own family, he was very lively and cheerful in his conversation. The Orleans family allowed him a pension of 3000 francs."

A CHINESE FEAST AT PARIS.

The Paris correspondent of the Times writes: "A few days ago Prince Napoleon gave a grand dinner in his Pompeian palace to his political, literary, and artistic friends. The dinner was in keeping with the character of the house and with some of the guests as well, one of whom was a Chinese savant. Some of the dishes were Chinese, and part of the wine was from Siam. Among the dishes were swallows' nests, the greatest of Chinese delicacies, cooked in the Nankin mode; fins of a shark, fried; olothuries à la mandarine; the interior of a sturgeon à l'octogénaire; aux rondelles de bambou; olothuries in salad, with pheasant jelly; rice des immortels; fowl, with Japanese curry; spinach with balichas, a dish much esteemed at Rome under Augustus; rice in Chinese fashion; Indian curry, etc."

IS WALKER A FRENCHMAN?

He adds: "Let us enregister a strange report in regard to Walker, which has furnished gossip for a week to the Paris journals. In 1847, the last year of the reign of Louis Philippe, and a year famous for its scandals, political and social, a Monsieur G., an aid-de-camp of the Duke de Nemours, was caught in the act of cheating at cards in a distinguished circle at Chantilly, and was obliged in consequence to leave the country. It was said that he went to Mexico, and that he died in that country. But lately a girl, the daughter of a ship-captain, whom he had seduced, and who had followed him into exile, returned to Paris, and by some unexplained misunderstanding of the girl's history, it was announced that Walker, the famous Central American filibuster, was none other than the expatriated aid-de-camp of the Duke de Nemours. And all Paris believed this cream of canards!"

HOOPS DENOUNCED BY THE PRIESTHOOD.

A provincial synod of prelates was held six months ago at the obscure town of Periguex, in Perigord, presided over by Cardinal Donnet, Archbishop of Bordeaux. The statutes were sent to Rome for approval, and have at last come back duly indorsed. One is against crinoline, and its publication has created a terrific uproar on the banks of the merry Garonne. Another anathema is launched against social clubs (cercles) of every kind. Neither of these two clerical attempts to interfere with what does not concern them has the slightest chance of being submitted to by the laity.

HORRIBLE DELUSION.

The proprietor of a house in the Square Napoleon, at Bellville, France, lately received a visit from one of his tenants, a woman of some fortune, aged about forty-five. She informed him that being in a great embarrassment she had come to implore his assistance. "I have," she said, "a dreadful secret to impart to you. I lately killed two of my children, and got rid of their bodies by cutting them up into small pieces and throwing the morsels at different times into the Seine or the canal. I always took the bits of flesh out in a small basket, and no person paid the slightest attention to what I did. But the heads and some of the bones remain, and I do not know how to get rid of them. I have therefore come to ask you, as you are a kind-hearted man, to aid me in causing them to disappear; or, if you do not like to do that, deliver me up to justice, for I am most miserable. I wish to be dead, but have not the courage to terminate my existence." The proprietor of the house then remembered that for several days he had not seen the children alluded to, and he naturally received a severe shock from his tenant's statement. Seeing that she had become greatly excited he persuaded her to return to her own apartment and remain quiet. He then considered it his duty to inform the Commissary of Police of what he had heard, and on that magistrate proceeding to the residence of the self-accused murderess, he found her apparently in expectation of seeing him. "I was sure you would come," she said. "Take me into custody; I make no resistance." She then gave minute details of the manner in which she had, she declared, put the children to death, and concluded by affirming that the heads would be found in a box in the next room. The magistrate went there but the box was empty. The commissary then made some inquiries, from which it resulted that the two children had been taken to the country some days before by their grandmother, and he soon arrived at the conclusion that the poor woman who had accused herself was affected with mental alienation, which led her to imagine herself a murderess. She has since been placed in a maison de santé.

PRUSSIA.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE REGENT.

It really does seem as if the change of Government in Prussia is likely to be productive of a fairer and freer trial of the constitutional system in that country. With reference to the coming elections, Von Flottwell, the interim Minister of the Interior, has intimated to the whole of the functionaries in the department that they had better abstain altogether from presenting themselves as candidates, and leave the field open to private persons. Now, as these functionaries were the principal parties who tampered with the elections, the Prussian people will have a chance of getting a fair representation in the Landtag. According to advices from Berlin, Prince Hohenzollern Sigmaringen has been charged with the task of forming a new cabinet. The following members of the new Prussian ministry have been appointed: Prince Hohenzollern, President of the Council; M. Schleinitz, Foreign Affairs; M. Bathman Hollweg, Public Instructor; General Bomin, War. The rest of the Ministers are to be dismissed as soon as the arrangements for supplying their places are completed. The Daily News remarks that the Prince Regent of Prussia would manifestly have found it impossible to carry out a more liberal and progressive policy with the Manteuffel administration still in office. Their dismissal was inevitable.

A PRIME MINISTER GUILTY OF STEALING.

In Prussia the press appears to be under a surveillance nearly as degrading as that to which it is exposed in France. A story is current, now that the Manteuffel Ministry has fallen, which was hushed up two or three years ago in Berlin, respecting the abstraction of State papers of great consequence from the escritoirs of distinguished people in that capital, and which, had the press been free, would have astonished the world. The story connects Baron Manteuffel with letter-pilfering and the basest espionage, and the stolen dispatches are said to have been forwarded by Count Munster, at Paris, to the Foreign Office at Berlin. Among the papers was a diary which gave an account of the daily vacillations of the King's mood respecting the Eastern question. "A copy of a report on the conduct and language of the Prince of Prussia while engaged in the military inspection in Westphalia, had come into the Prince's own hands. This report had been prepared by a spy in the service of General Von Garlach. The Prince brought the whole transaction under the King's notice, and the very temporary disgrace of Garlach was the consequence of this discovery. Now that we have Herr Steittart's story before us, it appears that Manteuffel was actually and habitually cognizant of the abstraction of papers by these disgraceful means, and this miserable espionage formed part of his system." What a picture this is of the inner life of Royalty in Prussia!

PRINCESS FREDERICK WILLIAM AT HOME.

We read in the Builder: "It will interest many of our readers to learn that the Princess Frederick William of Prussia sedulously cultivates her talents as an artist in her new home. The Princess makes practical use of her skill in drawing in the furnishing and decoration of her residence, and is having a studio fitted up in the new palace in Berlin. Her Royal Highness appears to be a great favorite, and many anecdotes are told to show her kindness. Shall we step out of our way to give one? At the last fair in Berlin, where every thing was to be bought that pleases young and old, there was one stall which was filled with things that are comforting and useful, such as felt shoes and slippers, worsted stockings, and woolen gloves. The Princess had been looking from the windows of the palace upon the various groups and knots of people in the fair, noting the harmony and contrasts of color with an artist's eye, when her attention was called to this stall, in which sat a lone woman to whom none went. The following day the same scene presented itself—the solitary figure and no customers. The Princess at last determined that there should be one customer, at any rate, and accordingly intimated that her pleasure was to walk. On reaching the bottom of the stairs she told the attendants that they could remain there while she advanced to the gate. Entering the stall, she asked the price of the contents; to which the woman replied that it would far exceed the purse of a young lady—it would amount to twenty-four thalers. The Princess had not twenty in her purse at the time, but the Prince luckily appeared in sight; four thalers were borrowed, and more old women than one made happy, for the contents of the stall were distributed as soon as bought. The story is told as characteristic of the kind heart of the English Princess."

DIVORCE IN PRUSSIA.

In Prussia clergymen frequently refuse to marry divorced persons, and these persons are consequently obliged to go into another state to be united. Recently a Prussian gendarme wanted to marry a divorced woman, and as the clergy of his native place refused to celebrate the ceremony he applied for leave of absence to go to Gotha to have it performed. In compliance, however, with the request of the clergy, his superiors refused leave. Thereupon the woman petitioned the Prince Regent, and his Royal Highness having caused inquiries to be made respecting her, from which it appeared that her divorce had not been caused by any fault of her own, ordered that a fortnight's leave should be given to him, and that it should be mentioned in the books that it was expressly accorded to enable him to marry.

GERMANY.

THE BLIND KING OF HANOVER.

The present King of Hanover is, as is well known, unfortunately blind. But the loss of the inestimable blessing of sight has, as is frequently the case, sharpened the other faculties to an extraordinary degree, and in the King it is especially manifest in the faculty of hearing. This sense is so acute that his Majesty is enabled, after listening attentively for a few moments to the performance of an orchestra, to say without hesitation the number of performers it contains; of course time being given for every instrument to be played in the overture or symphony selected as the experiment. The King, like most of the members of our royal family, is himself an accomplished musician

ITALY.

THE POPE'S DEFENSE IN THE MORTARA CASE.

The Giornale Officiale di Roma at length contains a note, in reply to the indignant outcry of the Press of Europe against the abduction of the boy Mortara. This tardy manifesto of the Papal Court, instead of containing elaborate arguments, fortified by documents and precedents to justify the act, is nothing but a jejune indorsement of the bigoted doctrines of the Univers. The following is the whole of it:

"The Univers of October 24 publishes a long and learned article, by Father Gueranger, in which, apropos of an event which has led to much noise on the part of the irreligious press, it is demonstrated that naturalism has taken possession of most minds. It shows that many Christians, having lost the true spirit of the church to which they belong, manifest, on the contrary, great anxiety, not for the sovereign domination of Christ, of whom they are members by baptism, but for the authority of the natural family; not for the rights of the church, but for the Pagan prejudices of modern society, and those ideas of personal liberty which seem to them a conquest to which every thing else is to be sacrificed. They consent to look upon faith and Christian practices only through the perverted medium of naturalist prejudices."

The Gazzetta del Popolo publishes a private letter giving an account of the journey of young Mortara from Bologna to Rome, from which it appears that his conversion to Christianity is not by any means so far advanced as was pretended some time ago by an ultramontane paper. It is stated that the poor child did nothing but cry all the way, and call for his father and mother. The sergeant, under whose charge he was, having endeavored to force a chaplet into his hands with a little cross at the end, the boy did all he could to reject it, crying that he wanted the name of God, such as it is worn by other Jewish children. The father, in one of the visits which he was allowed to pay his son, told him of the hopes he had that the Pope would relent and restore the boy to his parents, at which the boy expressed the greatest joy. The letter concludes with an account of the journey of the father and mother to Rome, of the indignities they were exposed to in endeavoring to obtain audiences, and of the calumnies which had been studiously spread among the populace regarding them, viz., that it was their intention to go and murder their own child! in consequence of which their lives were in danger in passing through the streets of Alatri, whither the boy had been conveyed.

THE BOY STANCH IN HIS CREED.

The Mercantile Courier of Genoa contains some details of the visit of the parents of Mortara to Altara, and which ended in their not seeing their child, and being ordered from the town because they had no passports. On their return to Rome the Secretary of State promised that they should see the child. The mother has given an account of this interview. She says he was evidently struggling between fear of the people with whom he lived and his love for his parents; "but the latter at length prevailed, and he declared that he would return home with us. I told him he was born a Jew, and that, like us, he ought to persist in his faith." "Dear mother," he answered, "I repeat the creed of the Jews every day."

TORTURE AT NAPLES.

A Naples letter of the 26th October says: "On the evening of the 25th September a young workman in the manufactory on the Irno was barbarously murdered. For ten days the author of it was unknown; still, as the deceased was a nephew of a native of Potenza, domiciled in Salerno, a police spy, this man threw suspicion on two or three young men, fellow-workmen of the murdered man. Those persons were arrested the day before yesterday per misure di polizia, and though the proofs of their innocence were clear, the commissary of police determined to extort from them a confession of guilt, and in order to do so exposed them to the following trial: They were consigned to the executioner and a first sergeant of gendarmerie, called Vigues, who, after binding their hands, made them go round the courts of the prison, giving them at every two paces a blow on the shoulders with a 'bull's nerve,' or leathern strap armed with nails, repeating at every blow, 'Confess, carrion, or thus you shall die!' After having been beaten for half an hour, morning and evening, they were left half dead till the following morning. This barbarous treatment was repeated for three days, including the present. Their relatives have entreated the Archbishop of the Jesuits, the parish priests, and many others, to put an end to this pitiless barbarity, but in vain. It is in such a way that 'investigations' are conducted in this unhappy country."

DROLL RELIGIOUS RITES AT GENOA.

A singular specimen of the character of the religion professed by the inhabitants of the neighborhood and also of the town of Genoa, notorious for their fanaticism, was offered a few days ago at Arenzano, near the "Superb City." A religious fête, the Cesacci, is celebrated in that place by processions, in which the male population indulge in trials of strength: the man who can carry the longest a gigantic wooden crucifix is rewarded by general esteem, and takes the place of honor in the drinking bout which follows the match. After all the money collected for the celebration of the fête has been consumed in drink the crucifix is sold to the highest bidder, and the libations recommence with fresh vigor. The enlightened portion of the clergy endeavored to put an end to this disgraceful custom, and the curé of the place announced his intention of devoting the funds collected for the celebration of this year's fête (eight hundred francs) to the restoration of the church steeple, which is sadly in want of repair. This decision provoked the indignation of the people, who dispatched a deputation to the Archbishop of Genoa, in order to have the reforming curé called to his senses. But the Archbishop and the authorities of Genoa pronounced themselves completely in favor of the curé, and dismissed the deputation. The latter, on its return, excited the population to disorder, and the offending curé was beaten severely in the church, when about to read mass. The deputation has been marched off to prison in consequence.

RUSSIA.

THE CZAR AND HIS NOBILITY.

The Emperor Alexander has addressed the nobility at Moscow, or rather the nobility of the whole empire, in grave and severe terms, on the apathy they have displayed in reference to the abolition of serfdom. A deputation of the nobility of Moscow having been introduced to the Czar, in the Kremlin, he said that it was impossible to thank them for their co-operation. They had neither been the first, nor the second, nor the third, to answer to his appeal. This had grieved him profoundly. The eyes of Russia were, he said, fixed on Moscow. He asked them to give him the opportunity of defending them. "I am," he said, "attached to the nobility; but I desire the general good." A letter from St. Petersburg says it is evident that the nobility silently oppose the wishes of the Emperor. The people of Russia have an unbounded confidence in the Czar. This alone prevents a terrible outbreak.

INDIA.

A MORTARA CASE AT MADRAS.

The Madras Athenæum contains a report of a remarkable case tried in the Supreme Court of Madras on the 24th of September. A respectable native, of the Chetty caste, had a son who was being educated at Patchappah's School, a native educational institution. The son appears to have attended school for upward of a year, when, in some way or other, he was led to the Scottish Mission, and there requested to be instructed in the doctrines of Christianity. One of the missionaries appointed an instructor, and the youth appears to have gone to the Mission premises for a period of about three months. The boy's father then went on business to Pulicat, and the boy took the opportunity of running away from home to the Mission premises. He was received by the missionaries, and lived at the Missions. When the father returned he made inquiries and found where his son was. He instantly went to the Mission and applied for the restoration of his child. He was told by one of the missionaries that his son was at perfect liberty to go away if he chose to do so; but the son, on being appealed to, refused to accompany his father. The latter then obtained a writ of habeas corpus, and the case was argued. The question for the court to consider was, whether the youth was of an age to act for himself. The father and other members of the family swore that the boy was a little over thirteen. The son swore that he believed himself to be sixteen, because his mother (who is now dead) had told him that he was sixteen. The judges decided that the weight of evidence was that the boy was fourteen, and that the father was entitled to the custody of the child, observing that the court had nothing to do with the question of religion which was mixed up in the case. After the delivery of the judgment the father approached his son in a supplicating attitude, and with tears in his eyes asked him to come home. The boy remained firmly seated in his chair, and refused to move. Two officers of the court were ordered to assist the father in carrying off the refractory youth, who then declared that he feared ill-usage. The Chief Justice informed him that if he received any ill-treatment he might apply to the court for protection. The boy then quietly walked away with his father.

A PARSEE CLUB.

The Bombay Times has the following: "We understand that a club has been formed by several Parsee gentlemen—the head-quarters being a garden near the Gowalla Tank—with the view of affording their wives the privilege of mixing in the society of males. It is a sine qua non for each member of the club to be present with his wife. Before their evening meals the individuals composing the little interesting party, mixing promiscuously among themselves, take an airing along the garden walks, and probably fancy themselves strolling in the bowers of Elysium for the while. While at their meals, no scrupulous restraint crosses the gentle flow of witticisms and harmless repartees; and the members separate after an evening's rational amusement."

THE FALKLAND ISLES.

A MODEL COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

The Falkland Islands contain a population of only twenty-seven, men, women, and children, and yet the British Parliament lately passed the following salary appropriations to the officers of the colony: Governor, £800 per annum; magistrate, £400; chaplain, £400; surgeon, £400; surveyor-general, £300; first clerk and acting colonial secretary, £300; second clerk, £150; clerk to stipendary magistrate, £96; school-master, £32; magistrate's department, £192; total, £2836 a year. It is understood that all the salaries are pocketed by three or four persons.

A DROLL STORY OF THE NEGRO EMPEROR.

The Chronique Parisienne contains the following facetious story: "The Emperor, Faustin I., who imitates France in all things, and has, like her, princes, marshals, dukes, counts, colleges, and universities, recently resolved to establish an academy of forty members, like the world-renowned French Academy. But it was not easy to select the forty, every inhabitant of the empire who could write his own name thinking himself qualified. So his Majesty decreed that 3000 of his subjects, who possessed the reputation of being the most lettered of all, should, on a given day, assemble at his palace and be subjected to a literary test. When they were collected he announced that the test was the writing of the word citron, and that those who made no error in the spelling should be members of the Academy. Pens, ink, and paper were brought; each of the 3000 people wrote the word, and the judges of the land and the bench of bishops were charged to examine the 3000 papers. They proclaimed that 39 only of the candidates had written the word correctly—that is, with a C, the remaining 2961 having used an S. 'Only thirty-nine!' cried the Emperor, 'and we want forty. Well, I will be the fortieth member myself.' 'Sire,' cried the judges, 'your Majesty will no doubt deign to submit to the test?' 'Of course,' exclaimed Faustin; and in a large, bold hand he wrote Xitron with an X. The judges looked puzzled for a moment, and then, after glancing at each other, proclaimed that his Majesty had passed triumphantly through the ordeal. The Emperor was thereupon proclaimed, amidst the enthusiasm of the assemblage, a member of the Academy. 'And I will be perpetual secretary, too,' added his Imperial Majesty, with pardonable vanity."

PROGRESS OF PRIESTLY DESPOTISM.

The following anecdote is from the Herald correspondence: "During religious processions nowadays it is not safe to stand up in the streets. Every one is expected to kneel down in the presence of the imageries that are carried at the heads of processions. The other day a procession was moving by one of our public houses, the doors of which were crowded with spectators, most of whom kneeled, but two remained standing, paying, as they thought, due respect to a ceremony they did not believe in, by taking off their hats. A priest at the head of the procession ordered them to kneel, with a vehemence that more became an enraged negro driver in ordering slaves than the Christian expostulation of an apostle of Jesus Christ. The standing gentlemen not falling down like vassels, the priest violently shook a massive golden cross to heaven, and after calling down anathemas upon their heads, in the name of Jesus Christ declared them excommunicated. This operation caused the whole procession to stop, and created a scandal before a multitude of people most disagreeable to the two gentlemen, whose modesty and good manners would have forced them even to kneel in a public street in presence of a religious procession, rather than to have been made the objects of so much disagreeable attention. This is the first time in many years that the priests have dared to go so far, and if this act be sanctioned by the government, as it must be, from the fact that now the clergy are the government, may we not be alarmed at their audacity, and justly fear that they are not idly talking when they speak of the restoration of the Inquisition?"

DARLING DORA M'ILVAINE.

THE rain fell softly on the grass,
Ah me! the summer rain;
I waited for the storm to pass,
The sun to shine again;
Ah me! the treacherous rain!
Will the sun e'er shine again?

While I stood beneath the shed,
Listening to each pattering drop,
Wondering when the clouds o'erhead
Would think it time to stop,
I saw her running down the lane,
Flying from the summer rain.

Saw who? Why, Dora M'Ilvaine:
Woe is me! that fatal day,
Watching in the summer rain
For the storm to pass away.
Years will glide too slowly by
Ere I lose that memory.

Darling Dora M'Ilvaine;
Seven minutes by the clock
Did I beg, and beg in vain,
For one single chestnut lock:
Dora, Dora, 'twas to me
All of an eternity!

I have seen some maidens fair
Skilled to win a trusting heart,
I have seen some chestnut hair
Braided with a wondrous art:
Chestnut hair and hazel eyes
Is not where the magic lies.

Never till that summer day,
As I watched the falling rain,
Had I seen that little fay,
Darling Dora M'Ilvaine;
Never since that summer rain
Heard of Dora M'Ilvaine.

Love is counted not by years,
Dora, Dora; well we know
Lovers' vows and lovers' tears
Are the things of long ago.
In those fast magnetic times
Dallying love is worst of crimes.

Twenty golden minutes fly
While she made my soul rejoice
With the laughter of her eye,
With the music of her voice;
Hazel eyes and teeth of pearl,
Dora was a pretty girl.

Dora was but sweet thirteen,
Half a woman, half a child,
Childlike grace and haughty mien,
Free and guarded, coy and wild;
Such a winsome woman fay
Never saw I till that day.

Dora! time and space has passed,
I shall never see them more;
When our lots in life were cast
We were placed on either shore.
Never shall we meet again.
Darling Dora M'Ilvaine!

A STREET IN NAPLES.

ONCE I was a boy in Naples. How I got there, I can hardly tell you. But being, at an age when most boys are cursing Cæsar and the Aunbeta Majora, thrown upon my own resources in Europe, and fairly provided with money, I drifted to Naples, as ships and rafters drift naturally to the fairest sand-beach in their vicinity. When I arrived in that magnificent city the Custom-house seized my trunks; a friend, ripe in official experience, warned me that a scudo was the solution of the problem: I gave it cheerfully (so one grudges money lent those who work hard for it), and took my first lesson in life à la Napolitaine. I pitched my tent on the Largo di Castello, within hearing of the grand music at the San Carlo, and within sight of the dear old bay.

It does not cost much to live at Naples. At one time when I was there—considered a good one, that I was but sixteen at the time, and had, for all means, the usual allowance of a Paris student, say $500 a year, with occasional presents at New Year and so forth—I had four full-grown men-servants and two horses. My major-domo was a Swiss, who received a dollar a day for his services; the others divided between them another dollar. Once or twice, meeting Americans there, I was ashamed of my equipage and suite, as unbecoming one so young and a student; but Guillaume, my major-domo, was not to be convinced. Monsieur might do as he liked. Monsieur might clean his boots if he wished, said the Swiss, little thinking that that operation was quite familiar to us as to most students. But if Monsieur wanted to see Naples, and not lose his time and his money, Monsieur must not interfere with his (Guillaume's) arrangements. The discussion invariably ended in my acquiescence in the statu quo, and on the day following I found my suite increased by a small boy or a flower-girl. Had I persisted, Guillaume would have impressed a regiment into my service.

Those were the days of Neapolitan tranquillity: before the régime of spies and sbirri, before the era of priestly despotism; before royal aristocracy culminated; before the outbreak of 1848. Naples was a pleasant place in those times. And many a happy day did I spend there, driving over the country from Virgil's tomb to Baiæ, from Sorrento to Pæstum, up to Caserta, round the bay, and away through the Solfatara into the depths of the cavern where dogs and men so often breathe their last breath.

Pleasantest of all haunts was the evening walk into the great streets—Chiaja, or Toledo, or del Porto—to watch the singular people of Naples come out of their daylight holes, and earn or spend their scanty livelihood. In an early number of this journal we described a street scene in Naples; the accompanying picture illustrates it well. In the words of one who knew the place by heart:

> "Every tinder under the sun is carried on in the open street. There are shoemakers and tailors at their benches; barbers plotting how letters for amorous swains; beggars mope counting clearly that all who do not give them a carlino will be served up hot in another world; big delicacy out of calderons, and beseeching the crowd not to let it cool; more monks, thinking little bells, and knocking Punch and the conjuror over as they hurry past with a dead man; ladies in Parisian dresses, peasant girls in scarlet rags; lazzaroni in every corner, lying, crouching, squatting, running, sleeping, laughing, fighting, picking pockets; and an array of carriages, carricoli, omnibuses, cavaliers, tearing and dashing along as a furious rate, as though collisions were impossible and bones could not be broken."

Not the least interesting of the Neapolitan street gentry are the singers. An eminent composer, who happens at present to be traveling through Italy, lentsinging stopped my way. In spite of the spell of the City of the Dead, in spite of impatience to break through the crowd of crippled, leprous, idiot-eyed beggars, who encircle one there with a hideous net—I could not choose but listen. Violent as the voice was, it was an alto of the best quality, which adolescence might change into a bass as weighty and sweet as Labloche's, were it not locked and strained at the gates of Pompeii. There was no elegance, no expression; and yet there was that "sun ecche" of time, accent, and motion, which betokens a happy southern, musical organization. Had it was—the music flowy—the occasion worse than impertinent; yet, with my head full of newer impressions, I have that square boy's song in my ears at the moment of writing—a day and a half after undergoing it."

STRADA DEL PO

T4FG2G:

A DETECTIVE EXPERIENCE.

I THINK it's best, since the story I am to tell is like to be a long one, to work as close as I can to the facts. It is the longest case I ever was on, and one of the sharpest, and if I can remember to stick to my text, and not go cruising round from Dan to Jericho—or Beersheba, one of the two—I think I can make out a story that you won't get tired listening to. Some of my friends tell me a good parson was lost to the world when I turned policeman. Well, anyhow, here's a straight yarn this time, if I know how to spin it, and I'll do my best, I promise you.

It happened in the winter of 185—a desperate cold winter, as perhaps you may remember—that there were so many burglaries down town, and so much complaint about the "inefficiency of the police"—that used to be the cry—that the Chief put some of us "specials" at work on regular night duty. There were several squads, five picked men in each, under the command of a sergeant, and our duties were to see that the patrolmen kept their beats, for one thing; but mainly to try to nab some party of burglars at work—catch enough to frighten and save him a sudden blow with something that cut; we could hear the ball spat into poor Kinner's body. I don't suppose you ever heard that sound. Well, in the rush that followed, the other prisoners struggled like good ’uns, but they couldn't get out of it; but Leon—that was the name of the man that gave the blow: Kinner said he knew him—he got off, running like a deer; and I after him. The storm was so furious, though, that I couldn't keep him in sight; and I couldn't track him, for the wind swept the pavement clean of snow. I beat the alarm as I went along, and hoped some patrolman would stop him; but after running a dozen on the rest. I tell you, it was cold work! I often thought that I should like to haul one of those old grumblers that was always complaining about the inefficiency of the police out of his bed, where he'd be all cuddled up under the blankets, and start him out on a beat in a northwester. Guess he'd step into a cellar, once in a while, for a hot "toll" too. It's such a deal easier to find fault, with the thermometer at "temperate," than to do patrol duty at "twenty degrees below."

AT NAPLES.

Speaking of "hot toll," though, I'd rather have hot coffee any time—and that brings me back to the story, with a short turn, and "carve me right."

My party was out one night—a little, fine, tingling snow blowing like old Boreas himself—and we'd just been together into Mike's for some coffee —he kept near the top of Warren then—and we'd cossed him to keep open for us that night. We came out together, and was just a-going to scatter round a little, when, looking up street, I saw a gaslight stop flickering, and gradually go out. I knew that meant mischief, so I sent three men round the blocks into Chambers Street, to come out above and head off the rascals, and I and the rest of us sneaked up, quietly, right toward 'em. We met the patrolman on the way—the thieves had followed him, and turned off the gas right behind his back—and we told him to follow us. We worked along slowly, to give the other men time to get round, and came smack upon the villains, all seven of us together, including the patrolman, just as they were about to enter a large silk-house—wholesale —on business. The fellows saw there was no use making a muss, at least, I mean they appeared to think so; but just as we were a-going to march them off, one of them gave a yell, and they all made a dash to get off. Only one got loose, however, and as the man that had him made a rush at him with his "billy," the villain turned on him, and gave him a sudden blow with something that blocks, without seeing a single patrolman, I concluded that it was useless to try that chase any further, in the teeth of a northeast snow-storm, and though I was sorry to give it up, I had to let him go. I went then right to the City Hall, and there I found the rest of my party; prisoners safe; but poor Kinner—they'd brought him in half-dead, with a horrid gash down his left cheek and neck! The blood was flowing—well, I'll skip that. He was attended to, of course.

Now you may bet that we were keund to catch the Leon—Louis Leon, he was called—a French rascal, a regular galley-bird; he'd lived and worked in London some time, and had been in this country a couple of years, and had always been lucky, never caught, though we knew well enough what he was for him. Kinner had spotted him once at the races, from a description. Now Kinner was a first-rate fellow, and we vowed we'd revenge him, swore we'd have Leon, dead or alive, before Kinner got well.

I won't take time to go into details; but we "turned up" every "crib" in town where we thought there was any chance of finding him, and spent two weeks, three of us, doing our best.

One morning we were sitting over the fire at the Hall, and Kinner, who was the senior, when one of the men says to the other,

"I say, John, you remember how them two fellows tried to get away with a rush that night when we were fetching 'em in? Well, one of 'em, just as they started, sung out to the other, 'Current wheat!' or something that sounded like that. Did you hear it?"

"Yes," says John: "I remember hearing 'em say something in Dutch or French, but I didn't think any thing more of it, because I didn't understand what they meant. Sergeant [turning to me], you've been across the pond: did you ever hear any lingo that sounded like that?"

I'd been trying to think, from the moment I first heard them repeat the words. The "wheat" sounded French to me, and presently knit came into my head; and then the "current" changed into guarante.

"Listen, boys!" said I. "Was t any thing like this?" and I gave them "gwat zele knit!" quick and loud.

"That's it!" say they; "that's it, exactly! What does it mean?"

"Well," says I, "that's French for forty-eight; and, if it means any thing, it means that this is the number of some den where they were to meet if they got away."

Number 48 was tried pretty thoroughly for some days, but no luck. You see we didn't have to search 48 Fifth Avenue, nor 48 Madison Square; we knew what streets to look in. Well, after 48 was served out, all there was left of that guess was to turn it round and make 84 of it, and try that. We had licit sure, all along, that Leon was too "fly" to live at any common resort of "cracksmen." We should have to look for him in some quiet place—perhaps in a very respectable neighborhood. We had tried the 48 in many streets where you wouldn't think of looking for a thief. Well, the long and the short of it is, that at 84—call it Yellow Street; there may be respectable people living there now—we found a house that answered our purposes. Our way was to make inquiries of the right kind of people in the neighborhood—old women, for example—as to whether that house was to rent, who lived there, etc.; different questions, you know, to different folks, as the Yankee peddler said when he was asked what prices he got for his clocks: "Different prices," said he, "according as I feel feels." We found out, from these inquiries, that the parties that lived in that house—no one knew their business—went in and out at all times, day and night, but especially at night; that there was an old man and a young man and a woman living there, besides boarders or visitors.

It would take too long for me to tell how we made sure that Leon lived there. It is enough to say that a journey-man tailor (one of our men) hired a room across the way, and settled the matter in less than three days. We found out that Leon was at home one night, and three of us made them a visit. It was rather too bad to get into a burglar's house with skeleton keys, but we did; we got in, found Leon asleep with his woman, and the old man—the girl's father—in the next room. I turned my dark-lantern full in his face, and, says I,

"Wake up, my boy! Some friends come to see you!"

He turned over, wide awake in an instant, and he knew us. I can't give his words, for they were a strange mixture of French and English; but the amount of it was that his fate had come at last, and he might as well give up to it peaceably. The woman got up and sat on the bed crying; the old man was secured, and one of my men was searching the house while Leon dressed.

"Vill you 'ave some eau de vie?" said he; "some good brandy, mon ami?"

"No, I thank you," said I.

"Bien! but you will smoke the cigar vit me. I got you one tres bon cigar!" and he went to his clothes. Lucky for me that I stepped behind him. I was just in time to see him reach out his hand for a revolver that lay on the shelf, when I brought my "billy" down whack on his arm, just above the elbow, and broke it. What with his pain and the surprise, and his anger at having his pretty little plan spoiled, his face wasn't particularly amiable when he turned round on me. I asked him afterward if he intended to shoot me?

"Certainment, mon ami," said he; "of course I shoot you, to get away."

After this little affair we got our prisoners off to the station-house quietly enough, though the young woman wept some—and a surgeon was sent for to mend my rough work. The house was searched, with no results, except some jewelry that, I believe, was recognized by a lady up town; but on searching them every one found some documents that proved to be of considerable value.

If you please, I'll light a fresh cigar—not one of the Leon brand—and give you the rest of the story. If I'm not mistaken, the best of it is to come.

In the coller of Leon's coat we found two papers. One was a small piece, old and dirty, containing the address of a house or store, some kind of place, in a street in Philadelphia: I knew it was there, for I recognized the name of the street—I've lived there. It had been so long between the folds of the cloth that the perspiration had soaked into it.

The other paper was a letter, written on very thin paper—a half sheet—and was tucked in on the other side of the coller, opposite to the place where I found the address. This piece had evidently been just sewed in. Here it is—see what you can make of it:

"3 — k1bh — m45 — h4 — r3bq — r4f — y2 — 1 — s44q — t4fg2 — q21x2f, ht2 — f3sth — y1b. = 3 — k1bh — 1 — e13f, & — 1 — x21q2f, h4 — y1w2 — 1 — h21y — 4r — htf22. = H4 — qf3j2 — 3b — 5rgh2f P45bhm. = 3 — gt1xx — n2 — 3b — h4kb — 3b — htf22 — k22wg. = Kf3h2 — h4 — y2 — kt2f2 — h4 — y22h — t3y.

"1qqf2gg — T2bfm — X1b32f, X1bg3bsn5fst."

It is all Greek to you, I presume; but it is easy enough to make it out if you go to work in the right way. Now such puzzles always please me. If I had thought that the letter contained nothing worth knowing I should have tried to understand it, just for the fun of it. As it was, for both reasons I went to work, and could read it all in about two hours.

It isn't any thing to boast of, though; for the cipher is perfectly simple. It didn't take an extra smart head to plan that out. I've seen puzzlers, though—some that took all my spare time for weeks.

You think it doesn't look easy? Why, just look here: See the number of figures there are, and notice, too, that 5 is the highest. Now there isn't a word, even the shortest, but what has a figure in it; some more than one. And now tell me what five different letters there are in the alphabet, one of which must be in every syllable. "The vowels," of course. And so you see what a start we have: a—1, e—2, i—3, o—4, u—5; and one or more of these in every word.

If you like I'll give you an idea of how I went on. It won't take long to show you how to begin; and the farther you get the easier it grows.

Printers say that e is the commonest letter in the language. Now look through and see how many 2's there are. Don't that help prove that my first guess about the vowels was a good one?

Now, in the next place, the is the commonest word in the language, and we have learned the last letter of it—it's a "2." So let's see if we can find any word of three characters ending in 2.

There's only one, and that's in the second line—"ht2." Strange, rather, that there's no more; but business men often leave out short words. This is a "the," we may be sure; for no one could well write a letter without at least one "the;" and as this is the only combination of the kind, and as it ends in e (2), why, this must be "the." So h stands for t, and t for h: at least, this is a fair guess, and we can prove it by substitution.

Now th is a common combination at the beginning and end of words. Let's see if we can find an ht any where. The first one we come to is "htf22." Now substitute, and leave out the f, and we have th.ee; and you can't help putting an r in the vacancy, and making three of it. So we learn that f stands for r.

Very well. Now we have a, e, i, o, u, t, h, and r; and we can use these to find more. Let's look for a word with one or more of these in it.

There's one in the second line, "f3sth," in which the s is the only one we don't know. Substituting, and leaving out s, we have ri.ht. Isn't this right, plain enough? And so s stands for g.

One link more in the chain! Read along till you come to "s44q," which equals goo., or, fuller, good. Easy, you see. Well, since q stands for d, that's an important gain, for there are a great many d's in words. You can find plenty of them in this letter.

Now, besides the vowels, we have the letters which stand for t, h, r, g, and d. With these you can go on, and make out the rest without any trouble.

The letter amounts to this: Henry Lanier, of Lansingburg, wants Leon to find for him "the right man," of whom to buy a pair of matched horses, and a leader, so that he can make a team of three. He wants them to use in Ulster County. Lastly, he says he is coming to New York in three weeks, and asks Leon to write to him, appointing a meeting somewhere with the horse-dealer.

Perhaps you think that I didn't get paid for my trouble, deciphering this letter. Well, you may think differently, after you have heard me through.

Mr. Lanier, to whose remarkable ingenuity we owe this doubly mysterious letter, thought himself very smart, undoubtedly; he didn't imagine that any one, even with the letter deciphered, could understand his game. But he betrays himself, in this way: The words "pair," "three," and "Ulster County" are underscored in the original; but of what use to emphasize them? Why not say that he wanted to buy three good horses; and, especially, of what possible use can it be to add that the horses are to be used in Ulster County? Moreover, why write an ordinary business letter about buying horses in cipher?

The mystery of all this is more easily understood by me than it would be by you; for I happen to know, as do the police generally, and many outside of the police, that "horses" is the "flash" term for counterfeit bills. So then, my translation of the strange letter is, that Mr. Henry Lanier, of Lansingburg—a noted resort of counterfeiters by-the-way—wants to meet a party in New York who will get up for him the plates from which to print counterfeits on the Ulster County Bank, and I suspect, from his emphasis of "pair" and "three," that he wants the denominations of 2's and 3's.

Now it is desirable that this horse-trade be interfered with. We can easily prevent the success of this particular plan; but this is not enough. We want to catch Lanier and his gang—for there are always several of them working together; and we want, besides and particularly, to catch them in such a way that we can prove them counterfeiters, and place them where they can do no more injury to the public.

My plan to accomplish this—a plan which was approved by the authorities—was to induce Leon to reply to Lanier, informing him that "the right man" would meet him at a place named, and would deal with him personally, "no third parties or go-betweens," on this business. I proposed to personate one of the "horse-dealing" fraternity; to work for him in procuring plates, and to lead him just far enough to make him indictable and convictable as a maker of counterfeit money; and then to nab him and as many more as I could entangle with him.

You doubt the fairness of the plan. Well, it is a debatable question; but you remember the "bogus baby case"—Mrs. Cunningham's "blessed baby"—which was managed by the District Attorney; that is authority for this kind of cheating.

My plan was a good one, though I say it; but would Leon help me in the first step, namely, writing to Lanier to come and meet "the right man?" He might and he mightn't; probably the latter. However, I could only try him, and I did. By this time he had taken rooms at the Egyptian Hotel, commonly called "the Tombs," and there I made him a visit. He seemed glad to see me, and talked as kindly with me as if I had not been the cause of his carrying his right arm in a sling.

"I'm sorry I had to do it," said I.

"It is all right," he replied; "if you not break the arm, I shoot you, sure!"

After an exchange of compliments, he praising my pluckiness in arresting him, and I, in return, doing justice to his acknowledged character as being the most successful of "cracksmen," I told him of my having read the letter, and hinted at having Lanier & Co. more completely in my power than was true. I advised him to shorten his own term of imprisonment by acting as our decoy-duck in bringing the counterfeiters into our hands.

"Now," said I, "you're 'foul,' and nothing but 'squeaking' on them can prevent your having the extreme penalty of the law. You're sure of being convicted on both counts, the burglary and the assault with intent to kill, and together they will send you up (to Sing Sing) for a century or so; and besides, we've got the Lansingburg gang 'foul,' too; we've surrounded them completely. Now, it will give us some trouble to get them, but if you will help us, it will save us trouble, and, in return, we'll do all we can to shorten your time."

His black eyes glistened as he looked up in reply:

"I have my character! I never 'squeak!' You catch Lanier how you please. Moi, I hold my honneur!"

It was a capital illustration of "honor among thieves." I couldn't but admire his principles; and I couldn't stir him, not an inch. Arguments, inducements, promises, were all thrown away, and I left him a little disheartened. Leon had made up his mind to endure his imprisonment to the uttermost minute, and would have staid in prison for the remainder of his life rather than expose his friends.

Well, I went home and considered. I smoked a bunch of cigars over my considerations, and they seemed like to end in smoke, when, on feeling in my vest pocket for a match—I am careless enough to carry them there—I pulled out a little dirty scrap of paper, which, on being opened, proved to be that address—one of the papers I found in Leon's coat collar. I had forgotten it entirely; but here it was, and I brightened up at once with an indefinite assurance that this would help me somehow. The more I looked at it the more I feared that its evident age would make it worthless; and yet I knew I should not rest satisfied till I had turned over this stone, and made the most of what might be under it.

So down to Philadelphia by next train: find the place—French milliners: go to a Philadelphia detective, an old friend, and inquire about them: he says they haven't been "spotted:" I tell him of my job, and what I want: my plan, to enter their store without their knowledge, if possible, and see what there is to be seen: he agrees to help: watch the place: on Sunday, when they are gone to mass—store locked—we get in by back-door: examine thoroughly: find, in a box in the cellar, silks, ribbons, laces that my friend pronounces stolen, the description of just such goods having been left with the police: he is positive that these are stolen: overhaul their writing-desk—lock a simple one—secret drawer, of course: find letters from Leon, addressed to his "dear sisters:" that's enough: have got the sisters under my thumb, and a new hold on Leon: my friend promises to keep mum for a while: I take the ambrotypes of the milliners, which I find on their table, and one of the letters; and—back to New York next morning.

Now I repeat my visit to Leon.

"My good friend," I say, "do you recognize these pictures, these letters?"

"Mon Dieu! mes sœurs! How you get these? What have they done? Sacré nom de Dieu! What is all this? Tell me, my friend!"

This was just what I wanted.

"Well, Leon," said I, "you see that your good luck has left you. I've 'got you foul,' every way. I've been through your sisters' place in Philadelphia, and have got them under my thumb. Their fate depends on you. Now let's make a bargain. You serve me, and I'll serve you. Will you talk?"

"Yes; it is easy to talk."

"Well, in the first place, you don't want your sisters tried and sentenced as receivers of stolen goods—"

"No! Mon Dieu! My sisters! It is all that I have in the world!"

"Well," said I; and then I went on and told him the whole story, from finding the address in his collar to searching his sisters' premises.

"D—n it!" says he, "I had been lucky so long that I had grown careless. I had forgotten that the address was left there."

"Now," said I, "you see that I have them in such a way that I can hold them or let them go. Which shall I do?"

He said nothing for a few minutes; then,

"I agree!" says he. "You give me your word not to do harm to my sisters, and I give you Lanier."

"Very well," said I; and we shook hands over the bargain. As he was rather particular, I went so far as to kiss the Book with him.

And now, by your leave, I will try to bring my story to an end.

Leon's letter to Lanier was written on a scrap of paper—the fly-leaf of a book—in pencil, and amounted to this, as near as I can remember:

"Tombs. I'm caught at last; but did your errand before I got nabbed. On the 13th, at eight in the evening, corner of Broadway and Canal, lower, west, 'the right man' will wait for you: short man, light, drab hat with a weed, dark clothes, spotted cravat: sign—you say 'Montreal'—he, 'Canada.' He is A 1 on horses. This is mailed by a sure hand. Good luck. Can't write more.

"L. L."

This was written in cipher, like the other. Leon assured me that Lanier did not know his handwriting, and that the cipher would convince him that the letter was all right. I felt rather scary about sending it, fearing that Lanier had read the newspaper report of Leon's arrest, and would be doubtful of my letter's genuineness, and so keep away; but I concluded to send it. Lanier proved to be just the man I judged him to be from his making use of such a simple cipher for his correspondence; he had that second-rate cunning which is always planning and scheming, and paid such particular attention to little things as to overlook, entirely, the grand points of a risk.

I was at the corner of Broadway and Canal at the time, dressed, of course, for my part in the play; and at eight, precisely, a little bit of a fellow came out of the drug-store, and ran up to me.

"Hullo! Charley," says he, "when did you leave Montreal?"

"How are you?" says I; "glad to see you. I left Montreal three weeks ago, but I've been traveling some time since then in Canada West."

Well, the result of our conversation—and we had a long one, at a private room in an eating-house—was, that I should get him two plates—2's and 3's, on the Ulster County Bank—he to meet me every few weeks, to see if the engraving suited him, and to pay the current expenses. I was a journeyman in an engraving office, and could get up just the nicest kind of plates. Of course I didn't forget to speak of Leon, and to congratulate Lanier that our matter had been settled before he was caught. I needn't go into particulars; but I flatter myself that I left nothing undone.

And now began the work. I tried at various engravers to find the necessary "rollers"—I don't know as you understand the process of bank-note engraving; if you don't, it's really too late now to go through all that—and, as I expected, the most desirable rollers were in the hands of the most honest engravers. I had to prove to them who I was before I could get what I wanted, but when they understood what lay I was on, they were very glad to help me. I got just the patterns I wanted and a good man to work for me. At the end of three weeks I met Lanier again and showed him my progress, and he paid me down the first installment of the necessary funds. So it went on, slowly, for nearly three months—note engraving is slow work—Lanier more and more pleased as the job went on. Another man came with him, sometimes, and I was introduced to a third who lived in the city, and I found out all sorts of news, a little at a time, news that I made good use of afterward. Finally, the plates were completed, and I got about six thousand dollars' worth struck off to be ready for a last meeting when our little arrangement was to terminate, and I was to give up the plates and the six thousand, and receive my pay in full. The meeting was to be at the rooms of Green, Lanier's city friend. He had rooms in a lodging-house in Frankfort Street. I had been told that I might meet some ladies—which I didn't like at all, but couldn't well object to—and true enough I found two there, Green's wife and Lanier's mistress. Quite a nice little party we made, Green, Lanier, and Farley—who came with Lanier from Lansingburg, and myself and the two ladies. Four gentlemen who had not been invited were waiting outside to come in—four good fellows, all ready for my signal. Well, as soon as I had passed over the plates and bills, and got my pay, we sat down to supper, and a jolly one it was. As it was to be the last my friends would have in some time as good I let them enjoy it, and I was the more willing since the mixture of brandy and roast duck, and Champagne, and oysters, and claret, and brandy again, and so on, was making my men an easier prey. It was a very miscellaneous kind of a supper, in dishes, glasses, and manners. The women got as merry as a fiddler's elbow; Mrs. Green even admitted to me, very confidentially, that she really didn't know whether she was "afoot or a-horseback." It was a wild kind of a time, I tell you.

But what a change came over the spirit of that dream when I quietly unlocked the door and in walked my waiting friends! I won't attempt to describe the scene. You may imagine men red with liquor turning pale with fright, dropping their glasses and staggering to their feet, eyes staring, jaws dropped, almost stupefied with terror: women clutching hold of the men and shrieking: and then, oaths and blows and bottles flying—I got this cut over my eye in that scrimmage—and a general row-de-dow. But it was soon over; we were too many for them; and in less than half an hour we had them all under lock and key.

All there is left to tell now, is, that those three men, and one more that I caught up to Lansingburg, are now at Sing Sing. Leon's there too.

THE DOUBLE WIDOWHOOD.

IN FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

IT was eight o'clock of an evening toward the end of July—a July long, long ago. The sun was sending in his westering rays at the windows of a substantial-looking house, the country residence of a professional gentleman, whose head-quarters were in Edinburgh. It was known as Clydeview Villa, and the locality in which it stood was somewhat famed.

The drawing-room fronted the west, and the blinds were all down. The children were all in bed. Jeanie Miller, or "Miller," as Mrs. Black—since she had been rising in the world—called her children's nurse, had heard them lisp their evening-prayer, and received the last sweet kiss, wondering, in her simplicity, that Mrs. Black did not like to do this office for her children herself.

It must be acknowledged that, on this particular evening, Miller rather hurried the ceremony—she had an engagement too—and she moved about on tiptoe, putting on her bonnet and shawl before all the weary little creatures had fairly closed their eyelids; but down they went at last in the sleep of childhood, and a regiment might have marched through the room without awaking the little sleepers.

The moment they were safe and sound she hastened from the house, and, striking across the fields, made for the corner of a fir-plantation, where, for nearly half an hour, a young man had been hanging about very impatient. For no other person would he have waited so long, and he was any thing but pleased at having to wait for this one. He had walked back and forward, and scanned the earth and sky, and decided that all the gates about needed painting, and thought many other things better and worse, before Jeanie came in sight.

Now, although she had been running, and knew she was behind her time, no sooner did she see George Armour than, from whatever cause, she took to walking in a very slow and deliberate manner. We have it on the authority of Mr. Milton that when Eve saw Adam she slackened her pace; and we have all, men and women, remnants of the Garden of Eden hanging about us to this day.

"You're late, Jeanie," was the greeting of her lover.

"I came as soon as I could," she replied; and, arm in arm, they turned into the shady path up the water-side.

When Mr. Black came in his wife roused herself; and after ascertaining that there was nothing of much interest taking place in the city, she said: "Miller asked out again to-night—the second time this week. She didn't use to take up with any of the people about. Next time she asks out I will consider it proper to question her."

"Couldn't you guess, Mary, what her errand is?"

"Guess! If she were a light-headed creature, I might guess it was some love affair."

"And not be far wrong. We're all light-headed some time, you know. As I came up I saw her walking with one of the painters who were here in spring—the one that did the ornamental work."

"That was the man I remember remarking for his good looks. Is it possible she can be thinking of marrying?"

"Shouldn't wonder—it's curious what notions people take!"

"Curious! I call it ungrateful. Here did I take her into our nursery, a poor orphan girl, and have kept her for six years. She suits me exactly—speaks well, and has no vulgar tricks or words; and she has taught the children to read almost as well as I could have done myself. They like her, and she likes them. Surely she does not know when she is well off."

"I'm sorry you are losing her: I'll give her a gown, and you can give her some crockery."

"If she is going, one thing will be quite enough, Robert."

"Now, Mary, on your own showing, I think we are bound to be a little grateful."

"She has had a very good place of it here, Robert, and there is no need for overdoing a thing. I wish I knew where to get one in her stead. It really is provoking!"

Nevertheless, be it recorded, Jeanie got her gown and her cups and saucers, and something more, when she left Clydeview Villa to become George Armour's wife, and was much and justly regretted by all the household.

It was a fair sight to see this young couple. Not that Jeanie had much to boast of in the way of good looks; on the contrary, George's choice had been matter of surprise to their joint feminine acquaintance. What did he see about her? What he saw, we can't say; but what was to be seen was an open, honest face, expressive of good sense and feeling, and a general air of determination. As for George, no one needed to glance twice at him without being struck by his really handsome face and form: so far as those were concerned, all the blood of all the Howards might have coursed in his veins. When we throw into the scale the fact that he was sober and industrious, and a capital workman—not to mention that he had saved money—the general remarks on Jeanie's wonderful good-fortune are accounted for. In a small house, furnished with things new and neat, and having a morsel of garden in front like a dainty apron tied on, there they were, these two, with youth and health, and the probability of a long and happy life before them.

It is an old saying—very old, probably, and true to the letter—that it is not all gold that glitters. Jeanie had not been very long married when she began to say to herself: "I am happy—very happy; I have every thing to make me so." Now it is to be observed that when people keep assuring themselves that they are happy, and further, when they repeat the statement to others—which, however, Jeanie did not do—there is reason to suspect some flaw, something wanting. A man in the pure air does not say: "I breathe, I breathe exceedingly well; I have oxygen and nitrogen, and carbonic acid—what more can I want?" He goes about with his lungs inflated, and his blood purified and enriched, and his spirit buoyant; he does not need to tell that he has pure air—the thing is evident. What was it? Nothing very tangible, nothing that the young wife acknowledged to herself. But "over all there hung the shadow of a fear." A little boy came: his father took to the child, and the shadow waned for a time. In the fullness of her heart, the mother decked her baby daintily. For the first time, George charged his wife with extravagance. Her face grew white as she answered: "They cost me nothing. Mrs.

Black gave me the things, and I altered them to fit George's."

"That may be, but mind I'm no the man to keep up the like o' that."

If there was a thrifty, economical housewife in the country it was Jessie Armour; but she could not be thrifty enough for her husband's taste, he was an unnatural thing in one so young, this overseeing propensity to save. It struck a chill to the very heart of his wife, although she tried to persuade herself that it was far better than if he had gone in opposite directions.

She reasoned with him; but George was one of those persons—Heaven help those who have to deal with such!—who are unreasonable to the last much effect as if addressed to the wind. She tried jesting on the subject, and her own heart grew miserable, and consequently received it in a way that effectually prevented its repetition. She often wondered what he did with the money—she was afraid to ask.

Then you see poor Jessie, while still believed to be a most fortunate woman, and putting a brave face on things externally, found that she was indeed unequally yoked. Perhaps George feared this, too, for he began to stay out at nights with society more congenial to his taste than home, generally flushed with drinking. His wife took no further notice of this than to attempt, at quiet, gentle way, to induce him to stay at home. Neighbors began to speak; some of them told her where George spent his nights, and, as she said afterward of a friend in a letter, "I almost felt the fire burn, and thought o' trying the flyting; but thankfu' was I that I bridled, for I had nothing to reproach myself wi' after."

It was one morning, when he had come child, a girl, was about six months old, that George, not as usual to his work, no look go action, not the slightest, showed that he contemplated doing so, but other purpose than going to his ordinary employment. The little boy was playing about the door as he went out, and cried "Father!" to him. But he did hear that cry, he heard as if he heard it not in fact—not as hope it did not, for it was sent in for comfort to the source where he always found it—his mother; and she soothed him by saying that his father was on the road, and could not speak to him now, but he would hear all he had to say at dinner-time; then, grasping the child's hand in hers, and setting the other to amuse her, she went about her usual household work, dropping a word and a smile to them every time she passed. Then, next to the time, dinner was ready, well cooked and comfortable. A meal which any husband in Georgy did not come; half pass, and there was no appearance of him. She gave the children their dinner, and waited another hour, but he did not have been detained—such a thing had happened before, and she did not feel surprised or uneasy; so clearing away the things, she sat down to her sewing, with the little ones playing on the floor beside her. It was just the old comfortable picture of a wife Villa ever again; and a stranger coming in would have said what a happy and contented one presented; but any one who had known Jessie then, and seen her now, would have observed a change. She was still young, but the brightness of youth had passed from her features, and its light however from her eyes. Her countenance had a pale under a kind of pressure acutely felt, though not just apparent on the surface, had taken effect. She sat thinking, as she worked, but not with any sense of passion for saving, and his rapidly-developing taste for drinking, would co-exist. What could she do or say? What could be done to prevent the recurrence of these terrible vices, before his very being was arrested over powered by the fatal habit?

Evening came, and no word of him; night, and still nothing of him. The children were laid to rest, and, poor things, slept the unconsciousness of their father's wickedness or their mother's care. Well it has been said, "Heaven lies about us in our infancy."

The solitary woman sat down beside the little curtain that shaded the window; she would have lifted it, but that she did not wish to attract the attention of any passer-by to the window. Toward the on the high road that passed through the village, and as there were no houses opposite, she could see over the hedge that bounded the small garden to the fields beyond. It was a calm summer night, or rather, it seemed that the day had scarcely departed to meet the morning. With eyes glued to the glass, and ears painfully stretched, she listened to the village, which was composed of only a few steps, echoing on the loosen road, would come on, pass, and die away in the distance. Toward the small hours these ceased entirely, and the silence was unbroken, except now and then when the comrades sounded its relief from the neighboring fields. Still she watched. The gray dawn of morning came on calmly and lullily, filling the mind with awe, like the dim religious light of a vast cathedral, till the sun rose and threw the elements of darkness over his land. Then Jessie, who had curled up from a house here and there, and early workers turned out to their labor. Jessie knew that still the weary woman sat on, one conjecture after another thronging through her mind, but no guess of the truth. In an instant conjecture was lost in the faint whimper of the baby drew her from the window, and she soothed it to quietness, and listened again, for momently she expected some one to enter with tidings of calamity. She prepared breakfast for the children, and ate some of it as she had been seeking, for she grudged every sound that interrupted with the listening watch she was keeping. By ten o'clock she could stand it no longer. She dressed herself, took the infant, and went to her husband's master to inquire about him. When Mr. Brown heard her question he looked surprised.

"Mrs. Armour," he said, "your husband left my employment yesterday morning; he drew all his money which was in my hands, and, as I understood, in a tone meant to convey some kind of comfort—"he is a saving, industrious man. It amounted to £19 16s. 6d."

Jessie, with her habitual prudence, controlled her feelings, and thanking him for his information, turned homeward. Where could it be that he had deserted her and the children? It looked like it. She formed her resolution. All the money she had was exactly sixpence. She went to a neighbor, and saying that she had to go to Edinburgh, asked her to take care of the little boy till she came back, and at the same time she borrowed a shilling. That's it. She, in her poverty, and her infant in her arms, she set out in quest of her husband.

Very fast she walked—excitement carried her on; and when she was more than twenty miles, a coach coming up, she paid it, 6d., and made the rest of her journey on foot—Edinburgh.

Arrived in Edinburgh, she went right to the shop of a former master, with whom she was acquainted, and whose kindly manner encouraged her to go to him in her present strait. She had no relatives in the city—Georgy was a "foreigner"—and to him she was constrained to rely on the good offices of an acquaintance.

Mrs. Armour, how's a' wi' ye? an' how's the gudeman? I'm glad to see ye, woman."

This greeting was kindly meant, and, as requested a private word with Mr. Boyd, and in a few sentences explained her errand.

"Ye dinna ken where he's round—But it's no possible."

That's what I think, Mr. Boyd, and I am glad to hear you say it; but what can it mean?"

"That's what we mun try an' find out. I'll just step across to Leith, an' see if they ken aught o' him there. If he's leaving the country, it's as like he will be there as anywhere."

So, leaving his shop in charge of his shopman, he took Mrs. Armour up stairs, and put her under the care of his wife, who, as she was a small easy till he came back—an advice more easily given than taken in the circumstances—and who was also a relief to have taken a decided step toward solving the mystery; and the kindliness of Mrs. Boyd was very soothing, while she put on her out-door garment she was so much in need of.

Before Mr. Boyd left, she was on the watch for him; and catching a glimpse of his face as he crossed the street, she gathered no good news from it. He looked grave, but not sad, as he would every where but into Jessie's face: he was at a loss how to convey the information he had got.

"Now, Mrs. Armour," he began, "I open up your heart; we've a' our trials; an' after a', it's no so bad as it might be. Ye'll do fine your family as yet; ye'll no want friends."

She rose, and grasping his arm, said: "Did you see him? For why can't you tell it? Is he dead?"

"No; he sailed this morning for America."

All color went from her face; she pressed the infant closer to her, and murmured: "Left me—left us! Oh, my God, my God! what will I do?" As for Mr. Boyd, he went down stairs and relieved himself by calling George Armour no end of ill names.

CHAPTER II.

If things could be seen in their true light, the poor have always the best of it, and so in the end it is supposed. Next day Mrs. Armour took her way home, comforted by the kindness of her friends, and with money—not much, but sufficient—in her purse—sufficient for her immediate wants.

There were many circumstances residing in Glasgow—elderly maiden ladies, differing a good deal in character and disposition, but alike in this, that they were kind, charitable, unostentatious; both lived in cosy flats; each had a narrow circle of her own, amongst whom she was supreme; sat at five o'clock teas and nine o'clock suppers.

One of these ladies had loved and lost, which, the poet says, is better than never to have loved at all—the case of the other. The latter had been loved, had loved, and won. She was a married house. Twice a week she had read the same newspaper all her life, and always read first that list which contained the names of vessels leaving and arriving.

The former had "gone through" a good deal; had struggled with poverty; had, as has been said, loved and lost; and we think it depends upon the way we look at it whether a love unrequited is not a better than never to have loved at all. Hers had not been altogether a bed of roses, which it once and forever hallows all it touches.

Well, very soon—for had news travels fast—these ladies heard of Jessie's unhappy circumstance, and met to lay their heads together as to what was to be done to help a woman in her position. To the dignitaries against George Armour. Both said with emphasis that men in general were very far from being worthy of what to be. Then the former she had never seen the man to whom she could intrust a daughter, and the latter declared that all the men were so ready to be deceived, poor things (with a sigh), and to believe all the fair speeches that were made to them.

After some discussion, it was agreed because to the conclusion of offering their young relative a home—which, in addition to saving her from sitting she might do for herself would, they thought, make her pretty comfortable. And so it would. Mrs. Armour, and explain to her the position she was in a position to make it an act of no self-denial. One of them was appointed a deputation to wait on her to the terms of the donation, which they regarded as a very liberal one.

"Jessie," said she, "we will give you twenty pounds a year, and will promise never to have any thing more to do with George Armour."

At first, Jessie had almost been driven blind and stupid by her husband's desertion; the very multitudinous green of the trees and grass seemed turned to blackness; but the necessity of getting through her daily work, and of planning for the future, and the consideration of her husband's great cruelty, in the light of her own innocence, had given her discrimination, without a word or a sign, brought about to strong a reaction, that sometimes she thought that such a man was not worth grieving after. In this mood of mingled pride and indignation she readily gave the promise which the ladies required; and Miss Black went home to rejoice Miss Ragle with the account that their cousin's eyes were opened to see things in a right way. But for all this, Jessie could not unsee herself, and the original tenderness often returned and overflowed in tears.

In her school was a little village, flanked through its houses and shops, its smithy and post-office-ways; even its nurse and its ball, in a way that might have made the place interesting, had it been less in existence, blank for its deliberation.

The moment it was more than rumored that Mr. Armour was great, but it fructified in a way which would have the blossom must have encountered front in the setting. In a day or two people had ceased even to speak about it; and Mrs. Armour found herself left to a wonderful village quiet twenty miles off, and inquired as to the probability there was of collecting a little school. There seemed to be an opening there; before she left, she took a very small house which chanced to be empty, and in the course of a month found her furniture removed and herself established as a village schoolmistress.

The "branches" which Mrs. Armour undertook to teach—and which she was quite capable of teaching—were reading, writing, arithmetic, and needlework. Her school was well attended; children liked to go to her, and had a "way" with them. Indeed, every one had a kindliness for her in their petty schoolmaster, who rather thought that she pushed out his interest. Her own child, a little boy, he considered, he could and would have quashed the opposition effectually; as it was, he could only look glum, and mutter.

As by perpetual attrition water wears the rock, and as the gradually accumulative action of the tiniest cave are reared by the residuum of the dropping water, so time obliterates the memory of a grief, dry up the tears the edges away, and sends its daily round of cares, greater or less, to build over hope, even over the most crushed and mangled a scathed and crushed creature has thanked the God of Providence that it is so.

Mrs. Armour was not her way quietly, and, in process of time, cheerfully. Her children were well and happy, and her little school, and little annuity answered remarkably well: but never a word of her husband, direct or indirect, did she learn. All that hope would let awake, wondering over what he could to doing, or where he could be. Sometimes she would think that he was comfortable and doing well, but wholly forgetful of her and his children; sometimes as destitute and an outcast; and then, when the latter impression an expes from control, she followed him in dreams to the ends of the earth. In the usual light of day, a form in the distance having any resemblance to his would cause her to start and tremble. She often found herself looking out for him at the school-her door, for she had heard and read of such painful recognitions after the years passed on, and no clew came to her hands to afford any enlightenment on the subject, until the seventh year of his disappearance.

The principal draper in the village had a brother, who had settled in early life, like many of his countrymen, to push his fortune, and found, like some others, that fortune rather pushed him. He had prospered in a modest but comfortable way, and resided on that, during his travels in America, he had met a fellow-countryman, and hearing the name of George Armour. They had traveled the same route for two days, and were passing a river on the third, when suddenly the ferry-boat capsized. They were all thrown into the water; two were drowned, the rest saved: the man bearing the name of George Armour was one of the two that perished.

When the merchant Jessie's ears else immediately sought an interview with the individual who brought it. Her own circumstances and domestic arrangements were just about to lead him to set off again.

He did his best to satisfy her anxious inquiries, but, as he had known more than a general acquaintance in the drowned men, he could not give so happy gratification as he could have wished. He also left him, convinced that, without doubt, it was her husband whose life had been thus brought to a sudden end. She was a widow indeed, and mourned in her heart as sincerely and more acutely than if she had seen the body laid in the grave. Her health failed somewhat under the shock of the intelligence, but a little change and relaxation soon restored her.

Miss Elder and Miss Bogle, though, as Christian women, grieved for the death of a lost man, felt a degree of satisfaction in the certainty that now he would not come back, as they always expected he would, to be a drawback on his wife.

It was the best thing George Armour had ever done for her self-denial he said to have done for his making her his widow. It secured her position; it improved her standing in the public eye; and it let her rest at rest. Any one who had ever been long tossed between hope and fear, knows that certainty even of the worst is greatly preferable to suspense. Widowhood is a legitimate channel, into which sympathy can flow without reproach or blame; but the neglected and deserted wife occupies very different ground, both in her own eyes and those of others.

OUR SPECIAL EUROPEAN CORRESPONDENCE.

ROME, IMPORTANT WORKS, November, 1858.

VERYTHING has been lately very much frequented by our people—a collection of some of the most charming of these now in Europe, as you will believe, is that of the Misses Hosmer, consisting of the warm-hearted wife and the daughters of our Minister to Paris, Mr. Mason, and Mr. Kennedy, formerly the Secretary of the Navy. I may not name more private individuals; but there were N——d's, and I——s's, and E——'s, to complete the society by the functions of hospitality and refined social intercourse. These had the best houses in the place, and seemed to enjoy thoroughly bathing, riding, and driving all the day, and meeting in each other's salons in the evening for music, dancing, and tea. To us an American was an introduction to this pleasant party,—and I not enjoy being with them? None but a habitual exile can understand how much the enjoyment of the burning familiar names and expressions; of meeting some one who has valued your fathers, or who knows others of your race—has touched though almost. I owe, too, I was not indifferent to other pleasures of very interesting nature, conferred on me. I acknowledge to a longing "for the delights of Capua," even amidst the refinements of Parisian cookery; and I must say the deviled crabs and spicy shavers of this summer at Venice, and the delicious fish and game, the nothing of seeing tea fit fowls or ducks lying side by side in the dishes—the extravagances unknown in these lands, but pleasant, nevertheless, to those who have been appetites and have good cheer.

Rome has been very full this season. The new aristocratic of English watering-places. The latter for the last few years, with a few weeks of the yachting season; but here they are established long-er, and is kept up by the circumstance of many of the "old families of Rome" having beautiful villas and cottage ornées, in which they receive visitors and give fêtes. A few days since I was on the pier, which is here the fashionable drive, when I observed Sir A——C——d looking, with evident curiosity, at the approaching boat from Civitavecchia, and then scanning its passengers with an air of eagerness and then disappointment. Then saw approaching the special steamer of the Admiral in command at Portsmouth, Sir George Seymour. Her flag was flying, which is the sign of passengers was on board; and soon it was said, "It is Lord Palmerston," which proved true. I rushed with others to see him disembark, and wished to see how vigorous is still his frame and how erect his gait. He came down with Lady Cowper, to spend two days with his dear friend and old college chum, Sir A. C——d. I have such an admiration of the man that it was a pleasure to see him alive so closely on his walk up the long pier, and to examine how fine a specimen he is of the hardy brow keen eyes, and saturnine but pleasant mouth. I had seen him in other days; but as we can none of us, live forever, I felt I should have no such another opportunity of looking at the Lion of England, the head and sagacious director of its processes and its rights. One of the evenings of his stay here was given to a soirée by which the graceful hospitality of the host gratified the English and sojourners in Rome, but which I missed by being on a visit to a friend's villa, and I was sorry to miss without its fruit in materials for this letter, since, on Sunday, in the Roman Catholic chapel, at Cowes, I had an opportunity of hearing the Cardinal Wiseman preach. The party I went with were Catholics, and were with the greatest regularity of convents, and I was placed just in front of the altar (from which a Cardinal always preaches). His name in that position so well known to the Church, and with which pictures will have made you familiar, by his ruddy face, more than that is usual, complexity; not so fresh, but as wise, redeeming the time, let reasons the days are evil." I was delighted with an hour, and was delivered with a warmth of manner not without its charm. But I ought in vain for any thing like fervor or declaration or even valuable inference. It was a pomp of words, vague and unsatisfactory, which, at times, some graceful imagery, or nothing for the mind to carry away or retain. The Cardinal is accused of being addicted to the pleasures of the table, and that during, perhaps must require a considerable supply of food. The brow is not intellectual; but there is a sensuality in the expression of the mouth and the lower part of the face which takes away the effect of this, and renders the combination altogether unpleasant. I was at Rome, eight years ago, when he received the Cardinal's hat, and was present when, by through his secretary, to the two nuncios which it is customary to give on these occasions—one a year or two before, the other at the time of his investment. The beautiful and lamented Princess Maria presided upon both of these occasions, and first evening adorned with all the ancestral diamonds; the second, all the pearls of the princely Borghese, which, for centuries, have been exclusive to her. I remember, as the first of these occasions, being told, before any one appeared, by the Cardinal's secretary, that the Pope had the intention of warning him "Archbishop of Westminster," a title which, as being that of a Protestant Englishman, turned pale with emotion at what he considered this insulting assumption and assertion. Mr. Hallam, the historian, was present, and—went up to him to confer with him on the subject. Mr. H. pronounced it "impossible;" but it was true, nevertheless, and almost the very first thing the Cardinal did after he had announced his name. The Pope was deceived by the representations of the prelates who were directly gratified by the event. Do not think it is only as a pendant to my picture of the Cardinal that I refer to you that we have had on the island Mr. Spurgeon, the famous Baptist preacher. I did not see or hear him; but a gentleman who did both described him to me as a greasy-looking little man, with lank hair and fat fingers; intensely vulgar, but eloquent and powerful, with all that influence over his hearers which is derived from earnest conviction on the part of the speaker and congregation. Perhaps my letter is already too long. The next will probably reach you from Paris. Ever.

A STORY OF FAUNTLEROY THE FORGER.

WHAT I am going to tell you, gentlemen, happened when I was a very young man, and when I was just setting up in business on my own account. My father had been well acquainted for many years with Mr. Fauntleroy, of the famous London banking firm of Marsh, Stracey, Fauntleroy, & Graham. Thinking it might be of some future service to me to make my position known to a great man in the commercial world, my father mentioned to his highly-respected friend that I was about to start in business for myself, in a very small way, and with very little money. Mr. Fauntleroy received the intimation with a kind appearance of interest; and said that he would have his eye on me. I expected from this that he would wait to see if I could keep on my legs at starting; and that, if he found I succeeded pretty well, he would then help me forward if it lay in his power. As events turned out, he proved to be a far better friend than that; and he soon showed me that I had very much underrated the hearty and generous interest which he had felt in my welfare from the first.

While I was still fighting with the first difficulties of setting up my office, and recommending myself to my connection, and so forth, I got a message from Mr. Fauntleroy, telling me to call on him, at the banking-house, the first time I was passing that way. As you may easily imagine, I contrived to be passing that way on a particularly early occasion; and on presenting myself at the bank, I was shown at once into Mr. Fauntleroy's private room.

He was as pleasant a man to speak to as ever I met with—bright and gay and companionable in his manner—with a sort of easy, hearty, jovial bluntness about him that attracted every body. The clerks all liked him—and that is something to say of a partner in a banking-house, I can tell you!

"Well, young Trowbridge," says he, giving his papers on the table a brisk push away from him, "so you are going to set up in business for yourself, are you? I have a great regard for your father, and a great wish to see you succeed. Have you started yet? No? Just on the point of beginning—eh? Very good. You will have your difficulties, my friend—and I mean to smooth one of them away for you at the outset. A word of advice for your private ear.—Bank with us."

"You are very kind, Sir," I answered, "and I should ask nothing better than to profit by your suggestion—if I could. But my expenses are heavy at starting, and when they are all paid I am afraid I shall have very little left to put by for the first year. I doubt if I shall be able to muster much more than three hundred pounds of surplus cash in the world, after paying what I must pay, before I set up my office. And I should be ashamed to trouble your house, Sir, to open an account for such a trifle as that."

"Stuff and nonsense!" says Mr. Fauntleroy. Are you a banker? What business have you to offer an opinion on the matter? Do as I tell you—leave it to me—bank with us—and draw for what you like. Stop! I haven't done yet. When you open the account speak to the head cashier. Perhaps you may find he has got something to tell you. There! there! go away—don't interrupt me—good-by—God bless you!"

That was his way—Ah, poor fellow! that was his way!

I went to the head cashier the next morning, when I opened my little modicum of an account. He had received orders to pay my drafts without reference to my balance. My checks, when I had overdrawn, were to be privately shown to Mr. Fauntleroy. Do many young men who start in business find their prosperous superiors ready to help them in that way?

Well, I got on—got on very fairly and steadily; being careful not to venture out of my depth, and not to forget that small beginnings may lead in time to great ends. A prospect of one of those great ends—great, I mean, to such a small trader as I was at that period—showed itself to me, when I had been some little time in business. In plain terms, I had a chance of joining in a first-rate transaction, which would give me profit and position and every thing I wanted, provided I could qualify myself for engaging in it by getting good security beforehand for a very large amount.

In this emergency I thought of my kind friend, Mr. Fauntleroy, and went to the bank, and saw him once more in his private room.

There he was at the same table, with the same heaps of papers about him, and the same hearty, easy way of speaking his mind to you at once, in the fewest possible words. I explained the business I came upon, with some little hesitation and nervousness; for I was afraid he might think that I was taking an unfair advantage of his former kindness to me. When I had done, he just nodded his head, snatched up a blank sheet of paper, scribbled a few lines on it, in his rapid way, handed the writing to me, and pushed me out of the room by the two shoulders before I could say a single word. I looked at the paper in the outer office. It was my security from that great banking-house for the whole amount, and for more, if more was wanted.

I could not express my gratitude then; and I don't know that I can describe it now. I can only say that it has outlived the crime, the disgrace, and the awful death on the scaffold. I am grieved to speak of that death at all. But I have no other alternative. The course of my story must now lead me straight on to the later time, and to the terrible discovery which exposed my benefactor and my friend to all England as the forger Fauntleroy.

I must ask you to suppose a lapse of some time after the occurrence of the events that I have just been relating. During this interval—thanks to the kind assistance I had received at the outset—my position as a man of business had greatly improved. Imagine me now, if you please, on the high road to prosperity, with good large offices and a respectable staff of clerks; and picture me to yourselves sitting alone in my private room, between four and five o'clock, on a certain Saturday afternoon.

All my letters had been written, all the people who had appointments with me had been received—I was looking carelessly over the newspaper, and thinking about going home, when one of my clerks came in, and said that a stranger wished to see me immediately on very important business.

"Did he mention his name?" I inquired.

"No, Sir."

"Did you not ask him for it?"

"Yes, Sir. And he said you would be none the wiser if he told me what it was."

"Does he look like a begging-letter writer?"

"He looks a little shabby, Sir; but he doesn't talk at all like a begging-letter writer. He spoke sharp and decided, Sir—and said that it was in your interests that he came, and that you would deeply regret it afterward if you refused to see him."

"He said that, did he? Show him in at once, then."

He was shown in immediately. A middling-sized man, with a sharp, unwholesome-looking face, and with a flippant, reckless manner; dressed in a style of shabby smartness; eying me with a bold look; and not so overburdened with politeness as to trouble himself about taking off his hat when he came in. I had never seen him before in my life; and I could not form the slightest conjecture from his appearance to guide me toward guessing his position in the world. He was not a gentleman, evidently; but as to fixing his whereabouts in the infinite downward gradations of vagabond existence in London, that was a mystery which I was totally incompetent to solve.

"Is your name Trowbridge?" he began.

"Yes," I answered, dryly enough.

"Do you bank with Marsh, Stracey, Fauntleroy, & Graham?"

"Why do you ask?"

"Answer my question, and you will know!"

"Very well, I do bank with Marsh, Stracey, Fauntleroy, & Graham—and what then?"

"Draw out every farthing of balance you have got before the bank closes at five to-day."

I stared at him in speechless amazement. The words, for the instant, absolutely petrified me.

"Stare as much as you like," he proceeded, coolly; "I mean what I say. Look at your clock there. In twenty minutes it will strike five, and the bank will be shut. Draw out every farthing, I tell you, again; and look sharp about it."

"Draw out my money!" I exclaimed, partially recovering myself. "Are you in your right senses? Do you know that the firm I bank with represents one of the first houses in the world? What do you mean—you, who are a total stranger to me—by taking this extraordinary interest in my affairs? If you want me to act on your advice, why don't you explain yourself?"

"I have explained myself. Act on my advice, or not, just as you like. It don't matter to me. I have done what I promised; and there's an end of it."

He turned to the door. The minute-hand of the clock was getting on from the twenty minutes to the quarter.

"Done what you promised?" I repeated, getting up to stop him.

"Yes," he said, with his hand on the lock. "I have given my message. Whatever happens, remember that. Good-afternoon."

He was gone before I could speak again. I tried to call after him, but my lips had suddenly got dry, and the words seemed to stick on them. I could not imagine why, but there was something in the man's last words which had more than half frightened me.

I looked at the clock. The minute-hand was on the quarter. My office was just far enough from the bank to make it necessary for me to decide on the instant. If I had had time to think I am perfectly certain that I should not have profited by the extraordinary warning that had just been addressed to me. The suspicious appearance and manners of the stranger—the outrageous improbability of the inference against the credit of the bank toward which his words pointed—the chance that some underhand attempt was being made by some enemy of mine to frighten me into imbroiling myself with one of my best friends, through showing an ignorant distrust of the firm with which he was associated as partner—all these considerations would unquestionably have occurred to me if I could have found time for reflection; and as a necessary consequence, not one farthing of my balance would have been taken from the keeping of the bank on that memorable day.

As it was I had just time enough to act, and not a spare moment for thinking. Some heavy payments made at the beginning of the week had so far decreased my balance that the sum to my credit in the banking-book barely reached fifteen hundred pounds. I snatched up my check-book, wrote a draft for the whole amount, and ordered one of my clerks to run to the bank and get it cashed before the doors closed. What impulse urged me on, except the blind impulse of hurry and bewilderment, I can't say. I acted mechanically, under the influence of the vague, inexplicable fear which the man's extraordinary parting words had aroused in me, without stopping to analyze my own sensations—almost without knowing what I was about. In three minutes from the time when the stranger had closed my door the clerk had started for the bank; and I was alone again in my room, with my hands as cold as ice and my head all in a whirl.

I did not recover my control over myself until the clerk came back with the notes in his hand. He had just got to the bank in the nick of time. As the cash for my draft was handed to him over the counter the clock struck five, and he heard the order given to close the doors.

When I had counted the bank-notes, and had locked them up in the safe, my better sense seemed to come back to me on a sudden. Never have I reproached myself before or since as I reproached myself at that moment. What sort of return had I made for Mr. Fauntleroy's fatherly kindness to me? I had insulted him by the meanest, the grossest distrust of the honor and the credit of his house—and that on the word of an absolute stranger—of a vagabond, if ever there was one yet! It was madness, downright madness, in any man to have acted as I had done. I could not account for my own inconceivably thoughtless proceeding. I could hardly believe in it myself. I opened the safe and looked at the bank-notes again. I locked it once more, and flung the key down on the table in a fury of vexation against myself. There the money was, upbraiding me with my own inconceivable folly—telling me in the plainest terms that I had risked depriving myself of my best and kindest friend henceforth and forever.

It was necessary to do something at once toward making all the atonement that lay in my power. I felt that as soon as I began to cool down a little. There was but one plain, straightforward way left now out of the scrape in which I had been mad enough to involve myself. I took my hat, and, without stopping an instant to hesitate, hurried off to the bank to make a clean breast of it to Mr. Fauntleroy.

When I knocked at the private door and asked for him I was told that he had not been at the bank for the last two days. One of the other partners was there, however, and was working at that moment in his own room. I sent in my name at once, and asked to see him. He and I were little better than strangers to each other; and the interview was likely to be, on that account, unspeakably embarrassing and humiliating on my side. Still I could not go home. I could not endure the inaction of the next day, the Sunday, without having done my best on the spot to repair the error into which my own folly had led me. Uncomfortable as I felt at the prospect of the approaching interview, I should have been far more uneasy in my mind if the partner had declined to see me.

To my relief, the bank-porter returned with a message requesting me to walk in. What particular form my explanations and apologies took when I tried to offer them is more than I can tell now. I was so confused and distressed that I hardly knew what I was talking about at the time. The one circumstance which I remember clearly is, that I was ashamed to refer to my interview with the strange man; and that I tried to account for my sudden withdrawal of my balance by referring it to some inexplicable panic, caused by mischievous reports which I was unable to trace to their source, and which, for any thing I knew to the contrary, might, after all, have been only started in jest. Greatly to my surprise, the partner did not seem to notice the lamentable lameness of my excuses, and did not additionally confuse me by asking any questions. A weary, absent look, which I had observed on his face when I came in, remained on it while I was speaking. It seemed to be an effort to him even to keep up the appearance of listening to me. And when, at last, I fairly broke down in the middle of a sentence, and gave up the hope of getting any farther, all the answer he gave me was comprised in these few civil, commonplace words:

"Never mind, Mr. Trowbridge; pray don't think of apologizing. We are all liable to make mistakes. Say nothing more about it; and bring the money back on Monday if you still honor us with your confidence."

He looked down at his papers, as if he was anxious to be alone again; and I had no alternative, of course, but to take my leave immediately. I went home, feeling a little easier in my mind now that I had paved the way for making the best practical atonement in my power by bringing my balance back the first thing on Monday morning. Still I passed a weary day on Sunday, reflecting, sadly enough, that I had not yet made my peace with Mr. Fauntleroy. My anxiety to set myself right with my generous friend was so intense that I risked intruding myself on his privacy by calling at his town residence on the Sunday. He was not there; and his servant could tell me nothing of his whereabouts. There was no help for it now but to wait till his week-day duties brought him back to the bank.

I went to business on Monday morning half an hour earlier than usual, so great was my impatience to restore the amount of that unlucky draft to my account as soon as possible after the bank opened. On entering my office I stopped, with a startled feeling, just inside the door. Something serious had happened. The clerks, instead of being at their desks as usual, were all huddled together in a group, talking to each other with blank faces. When they saw me they fell back behind my managing man, who stepped forward with a circular in his hand.

"Have you heard the news, Sir?" he said.

"No. What is it?"

He handed me the circular. My heart gave one violent throb the instant I looked at it. I felt myself turn pale; I felt my knees trembling under me.

Marsh, Stracey, Fauntleroy, & Graham had stopped payment!

"The circular has not been issued more than half an hour," continued my managing clerk. "I have just come from the bank, Sir. The doors are shut—there is no doubt about it. Marsh & Company have stopped this morning."

I hardly heard him; I hardly knew who was talking to me. My strange visitor of the Saturday had taken instant possession of all my thoughts; and his words of warning seemed to be sounding once more in my ears. This man had known the true condition of the bank, when not another soul outside the doors was aware of it! The last draft paid across the counter of that ruined house, when the doors closed on Saturday, was the draft that I had so bitterly reproached myself for drawing; the one balance saved from the wreck was my balance. Where had the stranger got the information that had saved me, and why had he brought it to my ears?

I was still groping, like a man in the dark, for an answer to those two questions—I was still bewildered by the unfathomable mystery of doubt into which they had plunged me, when the discovery of the stopping of the bank was followed almost immediately by a second shock, far more dreadful, far heavier to bear, so far as I was concerned, than the first. While I and my clerks were still discussing the failure of the firm, two mercantile men, who were friends of mine, ran into the office, and overwhelmed us with the news that one of the partners had been arrested for forgery. Never shall I forget the terrible Monday morning when those tidings reached me, and when I knew that the partner was Mr. Fauntleroy.

I was true to him—I can honestly say I was true to my belief in my generous friend—when that fearful news reached me. My fellow-merchants had got all the particulars of the arrest. They told me that two of Mr. Fauntleroy's fellow-trustees had come up to London to make arrangements about selling out some stock. On inquiring for Mr. Fauntleroy at the banking-house, they had been informed that he was not there; and, after leaving a message for him, they had gone into the city to make an appointment with their stock-broker for a future day, when their fellow-trustee might be able to attend. The stock-broker volunteered to make certain business inquiries on the spot, with a view to saving as much time as possible, and left them at his office to await his return. He came back, looking very much amazed, with the information that the stock had been sold out, down to the last five hundred pounds. The affair was instantly investigated; the document authorizing the selling out was produced; and the two trustees saw on it, side by side with Mr. Fauntleroy's signature, the forged signature of their own names. This happened on the Friday; and the trustees, without losing a moment, sent the officers of justice in pursuit of Mr. Fauntleroy. He was arrested, brought up before the magistrate, and remanded, on the Saturday. On the Monday I heard from my friends the particulars which I have just narrated.

But the events of that one morning were not destined to end even yet. I had discovered the failure of the bank, and the arrest of Mr. Fauntleroy. I was next to be enlightened, in the strangest and the saddest manner, on the difficult question of his innocence or his guilt. Before my friends had left my office—before I had exhausted the arguments which my gratitude rather than my reason suggested to me, in favor of the unhappy prisoner—a note, marked immediate, was placed in my hands, which silenced me the instant I looked at it. It was written from the prison by Mr. Fauntleroy, and it contained two lines only, entreating me to apply for the necessary order, and to go and see him immediately.

I shall not attempt to describe the flutter of expectation, the strange mixture of dread and hope that agitated me, when I recognized his handwriting, and discovered what it was that he desired me to do. I obtained the order, and went to the prison. The authorities, knowing the dreadful situation in which he stood, were afraid of his attempting to destroy himself, and had set two men to watch him. One came out as they opened his cell-door. The other, who was bound not to leave him, very delicately and considerately affected to be looking out of window the moment I was shown in.

He was sitting on the side of his bed, with his head drooping and his hands hanging listlessly over his knees, when I first caught sight of him. At the sound of my approach he started to his feet, and, without speaking a word, flung both his arms round my neck.

My heart swelled up. "Tell me it's not true, Sir! For God's sake, tell me it's not true!" was all I could say to him.

He never answered—oh, me! he never answered, and he turned away his face.

There was one dreadful moment of silence. He still held his arms round my neck; and on a sudden he put his lips close to my ear. "Did you get your money out?" he whispered. "Were you in time on Saturday afternoon?"

I broke free from him, in the astonishment of hearing those words.

"What!" I cried out loud, forgetting the third person at the window. "That man who brought the message—?"

"Hush!" he said, putting his hand on my lips. "There was no better man to be found after the officers had taken me—I know no more about him than you do—I paid him well, as a chance messenger, and risked his cheating me of his errand."

"You sent him, then!"

"I sent him."

My story is over, gentlemen. There is no need for me to tell you that Mr. Fauntleroy was found guilty, and that he died by the hangman's hand. It was in my power to soothe his last moments in this world, by taking on myself the arrangement of some of his private affairs, which, while they remained unsettled, weighed heavily on his mind. They had no connection with the crimes he had committed, so I could do him the last little service he was ever to accept at my hands with a clear conscience. I say nothing in defense of his character, nothing in palliation of the offense for which he suffered. But I can not forget that in the time of his most fearful extremity, when the strong arm of the law had already seized him, he thought of the young man whose humble fortunes he had helped to build; whose heartfelt gratitude he had fairly won; whose simple faith he was resolved never to betray. I leave it to greater intellects than mine to reconcile the anomaly of his reckless falsehood toward others, and his steadfast truth toward me. It is as certain as that we sit here that one of Fauntleroy's last efforts in this world was the effort he made to preserve me from being a loser by the trust that I had placed in him.

INTERESTING FACTS ABOUT THE MORMONS.

FROM OUR UTAH CORRESPONDENT.

GREAT SALT LAKE CITY, Sept. 11, 1858.

I SEND you herewith representations of the Social Hall, Council House, Candland's Saloon, and the store of Livingston, Kinkead, & Co. The Social Hall is used both as a church and theatre. This need not seem strange when it is remembered how theatrical all Mormon religious services are, from baptism up to the endowment—the most shocking and loathsome of all their institutions. Nothing is more erratic than a Mormon church service. It is the post-office, newspaper, legislature, Bible, almanac, temporal, spiritual, and social director of the people. There is no kind of order as to the programme of performances, reading, singing, praying, preaching, reading letters, or any thing else may come first; in many respects the service resembles a politicni meeting—the speakers talk to the people, and the people frequently question the speakers. But though there is all this absence of form and seeming freedom of expression, nevertheless the harangues of the preachers amount strictly to this: they declare that faith and obedience are the chief of Christian virtues, that Brigham is a prophet, that they know it of their own absolute and certain knowledge; they testify to the miracles that he has performed, that they have beheld said miracles, and know of a certain truth that he did perform them. Some of the silliest things in the world are narrated as marvelous miracles performed by Brigham. The speakers then labor to make the people believe that their present and prospective prosperity, as well as their eternal felicity, depend entirely and absolutely upon their believing and obeying the prophet Brigham.

Young will then get up, and for a little while he is his "dear brethren;" then in the name of the Lord of Hosts he will command them to do this or to do that, which they will do, of course, under peril of eternal condemnation. This applies both to matters of business and matters of conscience or religious faith. Sometimes this command is addressed to the whole assembly, and at other audience. Thus when Brigham was building his splendid Lion House, which is said to have cost fifty thousand dollars, as he was nearly completing one day in a sermon he held this language: "I have a mansion for you completed, and how much are you willing to do it?" Now I want every one of you who is to hold up his right hand." The right hand of every carpenter in the audience was raised.

"In the name of the Lord, and by the authority of the holy priesthood, I command you to build the Lion House!" roared forth Brigham. The carpenters were fairly caught in a net woven by their own right hands. They resolved, and they labored, so Brigham got his house shingled for nothing.

At almost every meeting of the Saints, many by the prophet, writing at a desk, the reporter, George J. Stansbury. He is quite an able man; but I can never look at him without remembering the time that Ramsby wanted to marry his cousin—he took her to the parsonage for him to be united to her—and was a happy unit. Brigham looked upon the damsel, who stood before him so delicately fair and blushingly modest, that he could not control his desires, so up he refused to unite in the holy bonds of matrimony the betrothed lovers, and himself claimed the beautiful girl to his own bosom as Mrs. Brigham Young seventeenth and himself there was instantly "made one flesh." Ramsby? Ramsby? Mayhap he is dead. Bless it. Brigham's objections to marrying cousins were all conquered by his own passion, and cleared in church that the time was shortly coming when his son by one wife could marry his daughter by another or his father by another and the same one. It is a very common practice here for a man to marry two sisters on the same day.

Brigham, ever since his return from the South to Salt Lake City, has kept secreted in his fortified and guarded house. Even his building could not begin in order to have the Gospel locked up for a season, as we have had no preaching since, save the one meeting that I know of as being held here took place on a Sunday evening, a few weeks since, in the Social Hall. I cannot learn what was the text, when word was taken in that some Gentiles were approaching, whereupon the congregation was dismissed in the middle of a speech by somebody.

That which most entitles the Social Hall to public notoriety, however, is the peculiar kind of meetings that have ordinarily been held therein every Saturday afternoon. They are wonderful in a kind unprecedented in history. The gross and shocking vulgarity there indulged in, entitle them to scalding and eternal condemnation. Hither I have seen the vilest mouthed man in all Mormondom, the man who sinks sin and loathsomeness to the very morsel under his tongue—presides at these meetings.

The Council House is the large square building seen at the right of the next engraving. It is built of stone, and is about the dimensions of the Tabernacle, which, more a million of dollars (in labor and money) have been lavished in the said, for the foundation of the Temple is not yet above the earth. The scene from the top of the Council House is very beautiful. Though surrounded on every view of the entire city; the valley for a hundred miles north and south; the rough and rugged Wasatch Mountains on the east, rising abruptly and close to the valley, their summits crowned with eternal snow; the West Mountains, far away, with ridge rising behind ridge, and peak above peak, and rolling away as far as the eye can see, into the blue ethereal sky. This commands a grand view of the whole of Great Salt Lake, with the vast islands in it, and the great mountains beyond beyond. That lake is an incomprehensible curiosity. It evidently covered, at one time, the whole valley around for hundreds of miles. It has now, for centuries its discovery, and is still, rapidly retiring from the land or drying up. It has no visible outlet or outlet, and several large rivers of fresh water flow into it. It is certainly a much greater curiosity in nature than Niagara Falls or the Mammoth Cave. Instead of being below the surface of the ocean, like the latter, it is four thousand two hundred feet above it. Three pails of water make one pail of salt. It is the purest and most beautiful salt I ever saw, being perfectly white on the shore, and have lived in Salt Lake many times. One can not sink in the water by any effort of the strongest will to do so very pleasant, for the water is so strongly impregnated with salt, that, if it enters the mouth, eyes, or nostrils, it stings and burns like so much fire. When the aquatic luxuriator gets any of this water into his mouth or nose, it is necessary for him to make for fresh water in the quickest possible time or he may be strangled. Persons have been so completely strangled in Great Salt Lake that they have drowned in water not above their arms. Beautiful strings of fresh water border upon the lake, while the adjoining mountains have large quantities of petrefied salt in them. The lake is eighteen miles from Salt Lake City.

There is no spot in the whole city that I enjoy as much as the Council House. The upper story of the building is divided into halls in which some very noted meetings have been held. It was there the United States Commissioners met the Mormon dignitaries and held counsel with them. Some scenes were there then and there acted. How the Mormons swore, and foamed, and boasted, and bragged, and blackguarded, has all been made public. How Cradlebaugh, the late acting justice in the Mormon church, spoke of the President's Message in a way that is not legitimate to be published in a newspaper. Commissioner Powell gave him a most scathing rebuke for it. But Snow rose again, and became a follower. The passage in this Message of the President is a lie—a foul, slanderous, unfounded lie!"

"Hold on there!" roared out Major M'Culloch, who is but little accustomed to talking before assemblies, because he always has his own say his words as directly and pointedly to the mark as he does his rifle ball. "That sixth proper tidal, and what you letter keep-and way are," for you don't gain anything by getting excited. You say every word in the President's Message is a lie. Now, then, why are you making all this fuss about it? You just read that last clause in the Message, which says the army are to remain in here; and if that is a lie, there is no necessity of getting mad or excited about it. If it is a lie, you know that it will come in here, and all that can't stop it." Snow, in the vulgar phrase of the Missourians, "takes the cake." I know that was said in Major M'Culloch's words that convinced every Mormon present that the army would not be withdrawn from Utah.

When the army entered the city it passed along the street right in front of the Council House, then early morning till late at night its bands, with colors flying and drums beating, burned along the streets, followed by their every step by the munitions of war. Not a man left his post, not an animal strayed; but, step by step, as regularly as the tolling bell, and as solemnly as a funeral moving on, the soldiers passed through the city, between the dwellings of the Saints, and through the dust from off their feet, as a testimony against the city. The Mormons were much surprised at the perfect order and discipline of the army.

There is no other building in the Territory which will remain standing for ages. Every other structure of Gentiles who are, or have been, here this year as Camilla's Saloon. It is the little building seen between the Council House and the Lion, and the store of Livingston and Kinkead, on the left of the accompanying engraving. That is the saloon that was the only house in all Salt Lake City where a man who was so wicked as to be a Gentile could obtain a mouthful of food. Camilla coined all the money in the Territory, and he always has his safe open when any customer is in the saloon, even though it be in a small way. So, when the Gentiles began to flock in here this spring, he took that saloon, put a man in it to sell the most substantial prizes, at the same time forbidding every one else from purchasing. The Mormons, for there was one David Candland, a little speck of a fellow, put up in the neatest possible trim, with his eyes constantly twinkling, and his tongue going like a night hen's remark that I have never yet seen a Gentile who was not a knave. Such they are. They are sunken, or dark, or ghastly, or glaring. There is certainly some mania in all Mormon eyes; none of them can keep you straight in the face for a time. Well, to return to Candland. He is a man of some education and ability, and was once a commissary, a preacher, a theatre manager, and a barber. He never told me that he had been a barber; but then that is a profession that he must have once have obtained his manners any where else than in a barber-shop. He is a little, dark, sneaking man (poor creatures! he don't seem capacitated to more than half attend to one), but they have never seen him without a smile. He is the only man in the chivalric Gentiles were scouted; not even so much as one of their wives ever came to it. The best beings! I guess they have not got many specs to be seen any where.

In 1849, Mr. Candland furnished us good country eating three times a day at ever-varying prices. As other Gentiles came in, and began buying for board, we would have to ask him every day, and then we would probably miscalculate how much money we would require for the next day's board. The custom was to pay our bills every Saturday; but no one, when he went to pay, knew what he could ever tell what it would amount to. Sometimes we were charged a dollar and a half a day, two dollars a day, or three dollars a day—all in the same week. So no one ever understood mathematics more than Candland. He bill but the very accommodating and very gentlemanly Candland. Besides this, he had a very smiling way of leaving himself entirely out of reckoning in the small amount of half a dollar every Saturday, under the head of "sundries," or some very scarce; that he "could not make change," etc., etc., so that we would be always and persistently forgotten before the morning breakfast. In fact Candland, I must be remembered, has been the manager of a Mormon theatre in the city of Great Salt Lake, also an actor; so his little peccadilloes are not to be wondered at; he was merely playing; and I am sure we Gentiles were very much in the wrath of our money in amusement. Our ex-missionary, ex-barber, ex-theatre manager, and now ex-host, used to practice a little on some of his old professions by occasionally sticking up handbills on his premises for us to read. One of these, I remember, read as follows:

IF in consequence of the ENTIRELY high price of all kinds of Provisions, and the COMBINED SCARCITY of the same, I am compelled to raise the price of my board,

DAVID CANDLAND.

At this stage of the proceedings the New Yorkers telegraphed to inquire if their opponents were not satisfied that the game should be drawn? They replied in the affirmative, the following complimentary messages passed between the contestants:

"PHILADELPHIA.—We consent to a draw, and congratulate the Chess Committee on the able manner in which they have conducted the game.

"NEW YORK.—Dear Sirs: We congratulate Philadelphia upon the formation of the first game of the telegraphic correspondence which is equal to contests by parties, and which can be a source of no dissatisfaction to either."

The New Yorkers played in the Rotunda of the Mechanics' Exchange, the players being protected from the crowd of spectators by a force of police. Chessboards were placed on tables in various parts of the hall, and the moves were received by the telegraph from Philadelphia. Bulletins thus describe the close-playing from there:

"The playing is in a small apartment, a peep into which can be obtained by the initiated at the door of which is strictly barred, except to the Philadelphia chess champions, the New York players, and the secretary of the players. Around a small table in this room four men are gathered, with five intelligent heads, all at a chess-board. The pieces upon the board and the moves are profoundly Greek to us; but we unconsciously find ourselves repeating over and over again with the chess eyes and earnest gestures, are discussing the move which shall next be made, and then passing with their fingers upon the board the probable effect of the next step in the game. After a somewhat long diffusion of explanation, the views are reconciled, the four champions agree, the move is made, and in a few minutes the result is seen by carrying the intelligence not only to New York, where the anxiously waiting men manoeuvring figures also, but all over the country. North, South, and West. New York, Philadelphia, and Boston are represented, and as the spoods over the wire to the move just made; and in the rooms in New York and Philadelphia analyze the game, and fortify themselves for contingencies.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Nov. 29, 1858.

THE foreign advices of the packet of the past week compare as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Specie.	Merchandise.
Week ending Nov. 27, 1858	$736,816	$1,761,858
Corresponding week, 1857	1,221,941	3,731,053
Decrease	$1,302,075	$1,318,203

The export of specie was only $399,711, against which we have received $1,134,033 from California. Money is slightly in demand, though we can not quote any advance in the rates of discount. Sterling exchange is 9@9½ buying, 9¾@10 for bankers', and 10@10⅛ for best acceptable. Stocks are generally lower, and dull.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Nov. 29, 1858.

THE movements in the leading kinds of breadstuffs during the week have been limited, but prices have been mainly for home use. The changes in prices were favorable to buyers up to the close, when the week manifested rather more firmness.....The probable closing of the canals by the middle of December has caused a pressure.....Cotton has been in very active demand, especially during the last few business days, and prices advanced.....Provisions have been in good request. Pork closes lower.....Groceries, Hides, Leather, Tobacco, Coals, Oils, and Tallow have been moderately dealt in.....The principal sales of Metals have been of Iron and Copper. Prices are unvarying.....Some really desirable and scarce styles of Dry Goods have been disposed of at full and heavier prices. Generally the business during the week amounts to $384,573 against $1,000,000 in the corresponding week of last year. The value of the imports at this port for the week ending November 27 reached $384,573,649 against $868,663 the same week of last year. The week's transactions have been moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations.

Freights continued dull. For Liverpool—Flour, 1s. 3d. @ 1s. 6d. per barrel; Wheat, 6½d. @ 8d. per bushel; Cotton, 7-32d. @ ¼d. per pound; Heavy Goods, 17s. 6d. @ 18s. 6d. per ton. For other ports unchanged.

The Live Stock Markets, last, Wednesday, was decreased for Beeves.....Veal, Calves, Sheep, Veal Calves were in fair demand.....Sheep and Lambs were dull. Hogs were in good demand, and prices were 1c. higher than last week.

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the Market during the week, is as follows:

Beef to fair quality Beeves, per pound	3	4@	5 c.
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head	30	00@	60 00
Veal Calves, per pound		3@	4
Sheep and Lambs, per head	3	00@	7 50
" per pound		5@	6½
Live Swine, per pound		4@	5¼
Dressed "		6@	7
Roasting Pigs, each	1	00@	2 00

The Country Produce Markets have been rather busy for Vegetables and Fruit. A lively business, however, has been transacted in Poultry. Eggs have ruled moderate, the supplies having been far more extensive than the requirements of dealers and purchasers.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS AND INFLUENZA.—The present colds, influenzas, neuralgic and rheumatic affections will at once give way to the active good doses of Brandreth's pills, which are admitted by all to be the best purgative and cleanser of the blood from all foulness in the world; and those who are suffering from it as a duty to themselves to see them. They will be valued as beyond price when used. Read the following:

Gentleman said that I should not live, scrofulous humors, with shreds of inflammation of the kidneys; pain; swelling. Could neither sit, lie down, or stand without mental agony. He had the assistance of the best physicians in the village afforded, without any relief. Ignorance of his sufferings. When hope had departed, as a last means he purchased eight Brandreth's vegetable universal pills, and then applied over the seat of the pain a mustard plaster. In due time the pills operated, and though the pain continued until this effect occured, yet in three months after, he recovered and can be found in a few days. Over two years have now passed, and there have been no return of the disease.

A gentleman of New Yorkfelt severe pain in the chest and stomach, made his will, and fully expected that his days were short. But he was prevailed upon to use Dr. Brandreth vegetable universal pill each night while they benefitted him. He commenced, and soon relieved even the first day. He took another, and then another, each day improved, and he still continued to take a pill each night. He did this for three months, and found that he was free from pain, and he became entirely cured, and added seventy-five pounds to his former weight.

Where is the medicine that can effect such results save Brandreth's pills? Principal office 274 Canal Street.

THE BUTTERFIELD OVERLAND MAIL TO CALIFORNIA.

WE in New York, who have railroad, steamboat, and telegraphic communication north, south, east, and west, and who have had but recently the belief that our almost daily arrivals of steamers from Europe were to be supplanted in importance by immediate electrical communication with all parts of the Old World, can but faintly estimate the enthusiasm with which the arrival of the first overland mails from St. Louis were received in San Francisco, and indeed throughout all California. The people of California had been accustomed to receive with grateful joy, for years, the semi-monthly mails of the steamers; and when they found that, instead of twice a month, their new mails were to come twice a week—that the great overland mail which had for years been talked about was not a myth, but a decided reality—they evinced an enthusiastic joy which it would hardly have been reasonable to expect of us in New York. They are, as it were, but a colony of the East—just as the London Times tried to show we were but colonies of the Old World, and therefore had so much powder to spare on the cable.

But the great overland mail is a fixed fact; and as such, we propose to enlighten some of our readers concerning it. This is necessary, because, in spite of the many scientific publications which have been made with regard to it, many people have no idea whether it goes by the South Pass or not; when the fact is, its most southern point is full six hundred miles below the South Pass. This popular desire for information can only be met—and met properly—by a brief but comprehensive description of the whole route, showing at a glance its advantages and disadvantages, what it is doing, which way it goes, and all about it, in a very few words.

The "Butterfield Overland Mail" was authorized, at a late hour of the session, by the Congress of 1857, which provided for a compensation of six hundred thousand dollars per annum for a term of six years. The route was expressly set forth in the Act to be such "as the contractors may select;" and as Congress could not agree over the matter, it was passed in this shape to the hands of Postmaster-General Aaron V. Brown to award the contract. Messrs. John Butterfield, William B. Dinsmore, William G. Fargo, J. V. P. Gardner, M. L. Kinyon, Alexander Holland, and Hamilton Spencer—most of them well known in New York—were the successful bidders; but, strange to say, instead of being allowed to select their own route, they were compelled to adopt one which made their mail a semi-circle, and took them nearly four degrees further south than they wished to go, and than there was any need of going—and thereby hangs a tale. The contract was signed on the 16th of September, 1857, and on the 16th of September, 1858, stages started simultaneously from St. Louis to San Francisco, and have continued running ever since semi-weekly, making their passages nearly always inside the contract time, which is twenty-five days between the two points.

The mail is exclusively a letter mail, and the only papers carried are by the courtesy of the Overland Mail Company, which we should have said before is a stock company formed by the contractors, who, being mainly the principal managers of several of our largest express companies, will doubtless soon have an express for light packages running as rapidly as the mail.

The route, starting from St. Louis, is 160 miles on the Pacific Railroad; thence through Western Missouri, a pretty-thickly settled part of the State, to Springfield, in Greene County; thence over the line into Arkansas, touching at Fayetteville, in Washington County, and over the Ozark Mountains to Van Buren, in Walker County, on the Arkansas River, opposite Fort Smith, where it meets the mail from Memphis, Tennessee; and both mails proceed thence on a common line to San Francisco. We have now been traveling 468 miles through a comparatively well-settled country, where the stations are about ten or fifteen miles apart, at farmhouses, and some comfort may be seen. In the depth of winter there may be a little trouble from snow, but very little. At Fort Smith we ford the Arkansas River, and take a short cut through the Choctaw nation reserve, in the Indian Territory. The Indians are very friendly. Crossing the Red River at Colbert's Ferry, the route leads through the almost undiversified prairies of Texas, through Sherman, Gainsville, Phanton Hill, and Fort Belknap, to Fort Chadbourne, on a branch of the Little Colorado, in Texas, a distance of about 467 miles from Fort Smith, with no settlements after leaving Sherman. There is, however, little danger here, as the Indians are seldom troublesome—or, in fact, in the vicinity in any formidable numbers. At Chadbourne the wild part of the route may be said to have commenced; for, after a ride of about eighty miles to the source of the Concho River, another tributary of the Little Colorado, the edge of the great staked plain is reached, where for seventy-five miles there is no water. The Camanche Indians are sometimes troublesome between the Little Colorado and El Paso all along here, but none have disturbed the Mail Company yet. The route leads up the level bank of the Pecos River, through the rough Guadalupe Pass, and then across rolling table-lands to El Paso, on the Rio Grande. Here, on the route the celebrated Comanche Trails, Indian Emba, Sierra Alta mountains, and other objects of note, attention being, rather long, as there are no inhabitants but the employés of the Company from Chihuahua to Franklin, a distance of 241 miles—not a house or a settlement—and little else but prairies and picturesque mountains, including the Organ Mountains, Indian Pass, and the American town on this side of the Rio Grande River called Franklin, the route proceeds up the Rio Grande, and after fording it, through the Mesilla valley and the lower part of the Upper Territory of Arizona to the Gadsden purchase to Tucson, the first settlement of any consequence from El Paso—except, perhaps, Mesilla—a distance of 214 miles from that place, over rough hills, mountains, and plains, and through a "Dondadil" Pass. The route, I understand is taken to Los Angeles, crossing many miles of heavy sandy desert—about thirty miles of which are in a level California valley—and connecting Upper California by a series of most lovely valleys, whose fertile lands and varieties of climate astonish the beholder. Los Angeles is celebrated for its delicious fruit—especially grapes, from which the most luscious wine are made. Here, also, begins the Sierra Nevada mountains, in but ninety-four miles distant, and last dividing line in the route. At 824 miles from Tucson, a distance which, until the last two hundred miles, has few charms for the botanist, and many for the geologist and mineralogist. From Fort Tejon to San Francisco the route is pretty well settled—a distance of 300 miles. Indeed, when within five or six hundred miles of San Francisco the scenes seem to change as if by magic, and the cheerless deserts and mountain passes are gladly resigned for the green valleys.

Such is the route, as it is understood, from the Atlantic States to San Francisco (2729) miles, which was traveled by the first mail stage-coach, according to the correspondent of the Missouri Republican, in half an hour less than twenty-four days. The Western mail made the distance in an hour or two less time; but the trips have since been made in shorter time, and there seems to be no doubt in the minds of most of those who discuss of a few horses by overdriving, the distance could be made in twenty days. Should this be done, the Southern route might actually have an advantage over New York in the transmission of mail matter to California.

But there seems to be no probability of this yet. The Company will not, doubtless, run their stock to death when they don't get any extra pay for it. Then there is another consideration—the pastures at Fort Smith don't look well. The Pacific Express, Northwestern, and Eastern mails are obliged to wait twenty-four hours, sometimes longer, for the use of the comparatively small Southern mail. This often occasions the anticipation of the whole mail by the steamer's sun when it arrives at New York is preceded but two or three days by an overland mail from St. Louis. This must be rectified in some way, as the passengers begin to complain.

There are accommodations for six passengers in each stage; and that for the stages have run pretty well—those from San Francisco especially. The Company is rapidly establishing stations for eating. As the wagons travel night and day, sleeping must be provided for them, though it is stated after the first few days it takes care of itself. Tired nature regulates that matter, and the old man has ceased the plains a few times he gets accustomed to both rough eating and sleeping. If the passengers should be dissatisfied with the way, before long, are a train of spring wagons following each mail. Even at this early day the mail has been assaulted four times on the Company's stations the following: three times by Indians, and once by robbers, of which there is plenty all the way through on a large portion of the route. There is no doubt that emigrants across the plains will now have a more certain guide, and that as the wilderness home by the mail stations will rest disappear, their places will not be completely refilled.

The necessity for military protection of this route through the dangerous Indian countries and rough mountain passes has been thoroughly demonstrated, and needs no inducement here. But without going into the very broad question which Indian policy is forced on us—without discussing the point whether it is designed to establish a Southern Pacific railroad at the earliest possible moment, or merely disinterested motives of the Postmaster-General and the President in placing the line where it is—it may be observed that thorough military protection is as requisite as the mail-bags themselves. It will take up more along the line than simply the force itself, check the Indians more thoroughly, and, in short, be a source of benefit all around the board.

It has been suggested—say, broadly asserted—that this route never ought to have been run so far south—that it is illegally placed where it is—that a route three or four degrees north would be better and cheaper—and that the experience of scientists, as well as practical, men demonstrate these facts. Undoubtedly, if there is the slightest atom of truth in all these charges, it should be lifted out; and perhaps that fact might form the subject of a future article in this paper. All we can say now is, that we merely have given an fair a record as possible, and that there can be no doubt that may route is better than none. The people of California have thought so for years; and could the enthusiasm which greeted the arrival of the mail-coach from the East be witnessed by our apathetic New Yorkers, who hardly read their "five days later news" from California by the overland mail, they would learn to appreciate this truly great enterprise.

Besides there will be many travelers over the route from among those who love adventure, and to a sufficient interest in the wild scenery of nature to risk a little for the enjoyment of them. To those men that are content to go where others go, and very few of it presents some curious feature in the intelligent mind, and the dullest could not but revel in fabulous wealth. The Colorado and the mountain scenery, the broad western rivers, the boundless prairies dotted with groups of trees, the deserts, some of which present the most surprising curiosities in the way of animals and vegetable; the mountains, the Rocky and the Sierra Nevada Western life, and all the concomitants of a journey like this, will not fail to interest the observing mind. Besides the country, must make it one of unflagging interest to a mind of any activity. It is said when that country was in a liquid or incandescent state. And according to the age of the quartz a the quantity of the gold contained in it. Geologists are calculate to a nicety how much gold will be found in a quartz vein, simply by the appearance of the quartz. Such gold mines are more difficult to work than plain sand diggings. The quartz must be crushed, and the gold extracted by machinery. Considerable time is taken to lose none of it. The quartz must be crushed fine enough, or some of the gold will remain attached to the stone; it must not be crushed too fine, or the gold particles will escape with the stream of water running through the machine. This is not readily be imagined. It is less tempting system of mining than plain diggings; but gold seekers may rest assured that it is the only system which will secure permanent and reliable returns for the outlay incurred.

GOLD DIGGING.

THE latest accounts from Frazer's River are melancholy in the extreme. The miners have generally left the mines, and returned to the diggings; in instances in extreme penury, have betaken themselves to other callings, or have availed themselves of the liberality of the British Mail Steamship Company and made the best of their way home to California. After waiting all summer for the rainy season, they discovered, late in the autumn, that the falling of the streams was simultaneous with the formation of ice; and therefore that, as the water was the power concerned, the Frazer River mines were a failure.

The newspapers which continued these disheartening accounts of the failure of the mines had them glowing stories of the richness of the gold mines of Kansas. Persons who have spent the summer in Pike's Peak write home to their friends they will return to the gold mines of Kansas and will make fortunes.

The simple truth is, that the soil of nearly all North America is more or less impregnated with gold. Wherever there are mountains, gold is found in the valleys of the Atlantic States. And streams which course down their sides. There is, for instance, gold in abundance in Lower Canada, near the line between it and that Province and the United States. Gold has been found in large quantities in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Virginia—as one or two gold-mining enterprises are being actively prosecuted. In New Carolina gold mines are of great and special value. In Georgia one of the finest gold mines in the world is being worked—whether profitably or not we have not ascertained—and one which does not involve the quantity of the precious metal contained in the mine. For years quantities of gold have been sent to the Southern Atlantic States, and sent to the mints. Gold we know exists in Tennessee, though perhaps in small quantities. It has been long the case in Iowa and Wisconsin. In Arizona and Sonora it is known to abound. In Mexico, it would have been a perfect mistake if it were not but for the greater piety of silver. In Nicaragua, Honduras, and New Granada, the Indians have for a century been digging gold in the way of bringing gold dust down to the sea-shore to exchange for knives, looking-glasses, buttons, and rum. And in Peru the discovery of the metal is abundant; the best authorities state that it is equally plentiful in Oregon and Washington Territory, and in Utah. Gold in California Bay have been, for a hundred years, in the habit of getting it out of the beds of streams and carrying it to the factors' depots. In a word, gold is hardly a spot on this continent, with the exception of level plains, far from mountain ranges, which does not contain gold.

Why no means follows that the precious metal can every where be extracted with a fair profit or for many. As the experience of all mineers teaches, wet diggings can never be permanently profitable. In California and Australia large sums have been made by the owners of lucky places in the bed of auriferous streams. But for every successful digger in a wet place twenty equally energetic and industrious diggers have starved. Wet diggings are altogether a matter of luck. The miner works away with it a certain quantity of gold. It may deposit it here, or there—a hundred miles from its source, or five hundred, or only a hundred yards. All is chance. The miner who chances to find upon gold-lasting sand may make $10,000 or $100 out of his location; he has no guide, no principle to enforce it. All is pure luck. It is much the same with dry diggings, though they have proved very profitable in Australia. They are, it need hardly be said, the beds of streams of which the sources have dried up. They have, over wet diggings, the advantage of being more handy to work in respect of yield. They stand on the same footing. The gold may have been deposited by the current here, there, or any where; by the north, by the south, by the round, or by the hundred weight. There is no test but actual exploration with pick and rocker.

The only gold mines which can be safely relied upon are quartz veins containing the precious metal imbedded in the quartz. Of course, as we have before observed, gold deposits of an earlier date than the wet or dry diggings. The gold found in quartz was ejected from the molten which that quartz was in a liquid or incandescent state. And according to the age of the quartz a the quantity of the gold contained in it. Geologists are calculate to a nicety how much gold will be found in a quartz vein, simply by the appearance of the quartz. Such gold mines are more difficult to work than plain sand diggings. The quartz must be crushed, and the gold extracted by machinery. Considerable time is taken to lose none of it. The quartz must be crushed fine enough, or some of the gold will remain attached to the stone; it must not be crushed too fine, or the gold particles will escape with the stream of water running through the machine. This is not readily be imagined. It is less tempting system of mining than plain diggings; but gold seekers may rest assured that it is the only system which will secure permanent and reliable returns for the outlay incurred.

THE FUTURE OF RAILWAY PROPERTY.

THE winter which is just beginning is going to put to the test the theories which were first advanced in the United States about eighteen months ago with regard to the principle of the American railway system. It was in the spring of 1857 that certain daring economists first advanced the opinion that there were no two kinds of railways—roads built to make money by carrying passengers and freight, and roads built to develop new country: and that whereas most of the countries of Europe had studiously adhered to the former class, the United States always had gone in for the latter, to its cost. However these opinions were new, and were warmly combated; their authors were alternately derided and answered; even the editor of HARPER, which appeared to bear them out in their deductions, was sat down by many as the fruit of infant nefariousness. Then came September. The season which is already upon us is going to test the question at issue between these theorists and their opponents.

If the railroads of the United States have been constructed by sensible people with a view of earning an income by the transportation of passengers and freight, then they will, during the coming winter, pay, after working charges expenses, and leave a trifle of profit over; for though the season is dull, it is not a season of panic and stagnation, and evidently an improvise which can not make money except during a period of excitement and expansion, is not much to commend it on general principles. If, on the contrary, railroads of the United States do not earn an income this winter, though they continue to increase the improvement of soil, and the scientific cultivation of old land, the inference will be strong that they were built less as money-making enterprises than as instruments of territorial and agricultural development, and that the return to be expected from them is not immediate through the medium of enhanced land values, than direct in the shape of dividends.

The question can only be answered next spring. Thus far, it is clear that the business of the leading roads tends to show that they will not need any income this winter. There are exceptions, of course. The New Jersey roads were built on the principle which obtains in Continental Europe, in consideration of a heavy tax paid by them to the State, they were secured against competition. Other lines, here and there, have also a monopoly. Thus, the New Haven and Hartford road enjoys a monopoly of a large amount of paying traffic. Topographical accidents have given the Central Pacific and Ashtabula road against competition, while it is an essential link in the railway chain between the Atlantic and the West. Similar circumstances establish exceptional cases for a few other roads. These companies are earning very large dividends. But when we turn from them to the leading roads of the North and West we find a very different state of things.

Four great lines serve as arteries in which the blood of commerce flows from the great Western country to the sea-board. These are: the New York Central, with its allies, the Hudson River road and boats, connecting New York with Albany; the Erie road, and Erie, connecting New York directly with Lake Erie; the Pennsylvania, with its recent connections from Pittsburgh to Fort Wayne and Chicago, connecting the Lake-continental system with Philadelphia and the Baltimore and Ohio, connecting Baltimore with Cincinnati, and thence with St. Louis and the Mississippi. Among the roads of the Far West, the most important are the Galena and Chicago and the Illinois Central, the latter, both of which serve to bring the produce of the extreme Western country to that great central depôt—the fairest metropolis of the Lake country—CHICAGO.

Thus far, as we have said, the earnings of all these leading roads fall far short of what they used to be, and are in many instances actually below the necessary expenses of the roads. Many explanations of this phenomenon have been adventured. It has been said that the decline in railroad receipts has been caused by the poor quality of the late crops. Other causes have been cast on the wisdom of the policy pursued by individual managers. Accidental mishaps have been made to bear a share of responsibility for the untoward decline. But we apprehend that none of these causes will suffice to explain the unprecedentedness of these leading railroad lines, if it should prove next spring that they have earned no income for six months. If, next April, it should appear that the Illinois lines have earned, during the winter, only half what they used to earn, and the four great roads in the section named only two-thirds their usual receipts, the inquirer will need to look beyond temporary causes to find the true secret of the event.

And if he should find that while, in proportion to the growth of the country, railroads have been unduly multiplied, and the expenses of one good road parceled out among three or four; if figures should convince him that the aggregate traffic of each particular railway has gone on steadily increasing from year to year, though the share of each carrier has naturally diminished in proportion to the number of rival enterprises established to divide it with him; he will necessarily conclude that the ruling principle of railway earning is the mere sacrifice of the railway enterprises for the sake of the country they developed. He will decide that railways, like some other instruments of enlightenment, benefit the country where they are built by consuming their own vitals.

CASE.

THE MORTARA CASE.

SECRETARY CASS has replied to the appeal of the Jews respecting the Mortara case, by stating that, the boy being a foreigner, and the offense having been committed in Italy, civil, this Government can not interfere. If his reply were as perfect in a grammatical as it is in a political sense, it would leave nothing to be desired.

No doubt the United States can not undertake a system of kidnapping on behalf of the oppressed throughout the world. This country, through a mistaken timidity, allows its citizens to be carried into the service of foreign potentates without one word of protest. Not a year passes but some citizen of the United States is seized in some German country and compelled to serve for a stated period in the armies of its prince. Scores of United States citizens are now serving against their will in the Prussian army. Appeal has been made to Mr. Cass, but that official has invariably replied that a naturalization as a citizen of the United States does not operate to discharge the burdens which natives of foreign countries incur by the fact of their birth. Under these circumstances, when the Government of the United States is confessedly incapable of protecting its own citizens against the claims and rights of which Israel is reasonable to expect it to intervene on behalf of a foreign Jew.

The day will come, it must be hoped, when the title of citizen of the United States will operate as a safeguard to its bearer throughout the civilized world. But it will not be in our day. Much less will the United States, in our time, so far as can be judged at present, take any manly interest among the nations of the world in favor of liberty of conscience, or the rights of independent belief.

CHAMPIONSHIP.

THE theory of a Champion, in the old ages of chivalry, was, that he was created, was that the Champion was ready at all times and in all places, on foot or on horseback, with the sword or with the lance, to do battle against all comers for the cause of which he was the Champion. The Champion at a coronation defied the world on behalf of the newly-crowned king; the Champion of a fair lady offered to combat to the death all and several who denied that she was the "fairest and virtuousest" of her sex.

Has the word changed its meaning? When that lovely product of civilization, the Irish Champion of American pugilism, Mr. Morrissey, declared that he would fight no more, he accompanied the declaration with the announcement that he resigned "the belt" to any one who chose to claim it. But when Mr. Stanislaus Kelly, the English cracksman, came over to meet Paul Morphy, he said not a word about acknowledging the superiority of his challenger, and his friend and patron, Lord Lyttelton, the President of the British Chess Association, while admitting that, in his opinion, Mr. Staunton should have met Mr. Morphy, still declared that the Englishman was, under the circumstances, justified in declining the contest.

It would seem to follow that Mr. Staunton has resigned, in effect if not in words, the title of Champion. Perhaps he acts as little value on it as Mr. Morphy. Certainly, if he would have done himself more credit than falls to his lot at present had he accompanied his refusal to play with Morphy with a manly and unreserved ment that the championship of Chess, which had so long been credited to him, now devolved on his young and spirited antagonist.

THE LOUNGER.

THE FIRST SNOW.

How softly it fell all day long! There was no wind to whirl it into drifts, and the lovely, complete, glittering weaving of that pure winter garment of the world went on in almost a warm air in-doors. The fields, brown since October, lay grateful shortly in brightness. The trees, resting and bare since the early November gusts, were robed enduringly and closely all over; feathery tuft and drooping spray standing equally out of their object et it—somehow with an air of meekness, like cattle in a storm—content to be. The evergreens revived, gurgled and grew black in the face as it eagerly swallowed the thick-falling morsels. The silent, splendid covering was absolutely pure and effective like the spirit that makes the crooked paths straight and the rough places even.

The Lounger's readers remember that he lately praised Ralph Hoyt's poems. Will they read them again from his "Snow," and say with how much justice he was praised?

"The winter, yet there is no sound,
Along the air,
Of windy wood or bare habile-ground;
But gently there,
The snow is falling—all around
How fair—how fair!

"The second fields would masquerade;
Feathered
Tree, shrub, and lawn, and lonely glade
How grand, even,
And joined the revel, all arrayed
So white and clean.

"Even the old posts that hold the bars
And the old gate,
Forgetful of their wintry wars
Of sleet and rain,
High-capped, and plumed, like white hussars,
Stand there in state.

"The barn-yard gentry, musing, chime
Their morning mean
Like Memnon's music of old time—
That voice of tone!
So mystical here, and so sublime
Their solemn tone.

"To delve his threshing John must his:
His sturdy axe
Can all the subtle damp defy;
How wader he through!
While dainty milk-maids, slow and shy,
His track pursue.

"Each to the hour's allotted store:
The woodman's ring
The broken harness to repair;
The sleigh 'd adorn;
So cheerful, tranquil, snowy, fair,
The winter morn."

What simple Dutch fidelity, and a pure objectivity, which is very unusual in our modern poetry.

ROBERT OWEN.

Robert Owen lately died, nearly ninety years old. He would have died a rich man if he had known how to bring his wishes into works. He spent a great deal of money, tried a great many experiments, and failed in almost every thing he undertook. His benevolence and his practicality were very unequally matched. He was a man without a sense of social misery. His philanthropic enthusiasm proposed to bridge it, his benevolence cut down for that purpose all the timber it could find, and when it had laid out money, and time, and labor, the well-designed bridge would not reach the river, and his bridge would fall short. The old man would never believe it. He disbelieved it for eighty-eight years, and died thinking his bridge was just in the eye of completion.

The Lounger remembers a very characteristic illustration of this indomitable faith, or utter and ludicrous credulity, of Robert Owen. When he was last in this country he was sitting one evening in a circle of philosophers and poets, to whom he was telling the story of his life and of his schemes. He was with famous people, and his general success, as he considered it. "I assure you," said he, earnestly—his pleasant, bald, old face beaming with light as he spoke—"I assure you Prince Metternich himself has spoken to me very favorably of my projects!"

"Indeed, indeed, Mr. Owen—that is interesting!" said Joey, upon whom the effect was lost.

"Why, when I was in Vienna, many years ago, I succeeded in obtaining an interview with the Prince, who received me very graciously. For full fifteen minutes I unfolded to him my schemes. He listened with profound interest and attention. Then he rose, and, looking at the clock in the room, said, 'I see most now excuse me, Mr. Owen —but— and the great statesman said it with a very marked emphasis—but your suggestions are of exciting attention. Gentlemen, good-day! Oh, yes, Prince Metternich was a practical man, and he granted that my plans were valuable!"

Robert Owen lived to be an old, old man; but he had a joy's enthusiasm, and was of singularly guileless character. He spent a large fortune in his enterprises, and in a question (is it?) whether he did not live as honorably and usefully for mankind, by spending his money in trying to help them, as he would had he invested fabulous wealth by successfully helping himself.

SONNET BY MRS. KEMBLE.

In the new volume by Mrs. Kemble, just about to appear from the press of Ticknor & Fields, the Lounger has had the pleasure of reading a few of the sonnets, and he having first read in these columns of the Lounger, "Mr. Jones's Party," we have taken one of them. But this striking sonnet is new and beautiful:

WINTER.

I saw him on his throne far in the north,
Him we call Winter—piercing him ever,
As aged cart, whose bones are all of silver,
Drew o'er the fiery element his car.
But 'mid his robes of snow-pall, whence they
Was crowned with jagged lichen, and forth
From his keen sight-glance there issued a light,
Broad, daring, pitilessly cold and bright.
His breath like silver spears pierced the air,
The naked earth crouched shuddering at his feet,
His finger on high and fleecy summits stood,
Forbidding lay—motion nor sound was there—
Nature was frozen dead—cold, cold and bare.
A wintling-bird fell o'er her body fair,
Flaky and soft, from his wide wings of snow.

IMPUDENCE.

Our Hebrew fellow-citizens are holding meetings all over the country to express themselves upon the Mortara outrage in Italy. And certainly there has been nothing in the modern history of Europe lately come to light in public affairs. The facts of the case are familiar enough; but there is something unprecedented in the way in which so small a pinful outrage.

That in the age of the world—the fourth century after Luther, our Church should claim the right of privicel appropriation of any body whatsoever in all the land, by the kind of process through which the boy Mortara was passed should be the serious proposition that but extinguish the whole old gentleman Pio Nino, for body snatching, is positively sublime in its impudence.

Shall we not have a word about it, English or American boy, that there might have been a vexillation of tables!

Only, in that case, the boy, although sprinkled by ten thousand nursery maids, would never have been touched!

A WORD UPON LONGFELLOW.

The Lounger's correspondence, as it has his own impression of the poet, and states it so as to be sure to interest our readers, although they will not confess the pleasure they take in reading it.

"We may consider Longfellow also a Hafiez, but differently—as the Yankee of his whole nation—though he is, really, not Yankee at all. Friedrich is also one of the Hafizy and Minnis of New England, howbeit these daughters are not worthy of the name. I say that the country is so divided on its national poet. His friends claim too much, and his enemies certainly not a great deal. But he is a good district, which his detractors are loth to admit. There is no poet in the United States anywhere whoever he is one, not by formal introduction, but by the personality of his works. Longfellow is every where apparent; for, of all the poets, Longfellow is pre-eminently the poet of nations—the Pegasus of poetry, generally speaking. In the first place, he has never been at a sensat at Springfield—moving with a grand martial tread, or (in the Yankee manner) with the gait of a prude at a denizen of the universe. Note the activity in his poem on the Iron Horse, the Luck of Edenhall, and almost literally 'see the French war-steamers speeding over.' Even in his epics and his dramatic and didactic poems is evident. The popularity of the 'Psalm of Life' is owing to its free-life movement. So with the Hiawatha—familiar as household words. It is this current that carries you through the work. The principle that regulates the hexameter in 'Miles Standish' and 'Evangeline,' no less than the trochaic in Hiawatha.

"Mr. Longfellow's love of the antique is seen in his treatment of it when he takes up subjects many a choice and spreads over the ruins a beautiful, dreamy haze. But it is with the busy air of a traveler—as, particularly, in the Golden Legend; with the impression that the old city is alive with 'toil and traffic' but more active and industrious than any of the 'works' of the poet. In this respect Longfellow is related to Macaulay. Each seems to have a high idea of activity. It is his fate, he has little art. In America the artist is yet to appear that will combine the light and shade of poetry and to give brilliance to his thoughts, so Longfellow treats his subjects rather too much.

F. G. finds fault with his similes, too carefully studied and nicely adjusted; too merely ornamental, and falsely introduced. He says he quarrels a little with Miles Standish, but concludes:

"Mr. Longfellow has him in almost every vein—poet and dramatic—and every form is so perfect that independence is never forgiven; and yet he is not distinguished for originality, and his style of thought is so rich, according to the character of his movement. You have the chink of the knight's armor, not the guitar of the troubadour. F. G."

IMPORTANT QUERY.

"MY DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—It is too dreadful to believe—and yet I am afraid it is true—and yet I must confide to your sympathetic bosom. The very thought of some things is overwhelming. Mary, Mary, Mary, Mary, Mary, Mary, Mary, need to say that the idea of my gentleman's making proposals for my hand was not to be thought of later. Poor lady! it was undoubtedly so. A kind Providence prevented her succumbing to any such proposition, by causing it to be withheld.

"But this thought of mine is not of the same kind. It is a kind of impression based upon experiences. In one word, dear Sir—and you must excuse it there, can there be such a monster as—my pen refuses to write the name—and therefore whisper the word—a FEMALE DOG?

"Now, Sir, strike but hear.

"One day last week I was walking in Broadway, and stopped, as usual, at Springfield, to dinner. Before leaving my seat I very carefully spread my travelling-shawl on what I must necessarily be next, and, sure of having secured my place, went calmly to consume the mid-day grog. Just before the train started I returned and entered the car, while I had carefully noted. I went to my seat, and found it occupied by two—pugs in bonnets. Unable to believe my eyes, I waved, and said, incredulously—seeing my garment upon the back of the seat—'Ladies!' Instantly belong to either of you, ladies?

"No!' crisp, and with a wag of the head.

"I pulled it off the seat and laid it over my arm, looking at the—beings for some kind of human recognition that they were not dogs—but they were dead, and that they were sorry to accommodate me.

"Not a sign of any such acknowledgment could I see. "It is too dreadful for belief! But I repeat, and through you, Sir, I ask them honestest beings—is there such a creature as a female of the Hog Family?

"And, if so, does it not surpass the wildest imagination that there should be two in the same car and upon the same seat? Yours respectfully,

"AUNT CHARLOTTE."

—The Lounger does not venture a reply.

DARBY, DELAWARE COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

THE Lounger presents his compliments to his correspondent in the above town, and desires to say to him that, as he is willing to publish, as a communication, any thing that seems to him a fair criticism of any tactic of interest, he can not refuse to publish this communication it is not. The Lounger has an implied contract with his readers that he will be open to speak his mind, in speaking, and not somebody else in a mask of him; and he is sure that his correspondent, and all others, will see that it is not consistent with that honesty would persuit no other course.

MADAME MARIO.

THIS lady, who has just come from Italy, and has begun her lectures, brings, we understand, the most unqualified praise from the best judges of people in Italy—the Brownings and others.

She proposes to speak, in the present condition of Italy, and to tell us a few secrets of the Government and spirit that are now paramount there. Madame Mario is a private letter, speaks of her eloquence in description as remarkable—as beyond that of all the speakers we have heard. Of course it does just after the Mortara business, which has renewed the public interest in that fearful system of iniquity which, under various names, controls all cities in Italy, she can hardly fail to excite attention to her lectures. She proposes, we believe, to be impossible that she should have other than a generous reception in the metropolis of a free country, and we wish her success fully and generally—a joys that liberty for which enthusiastic and high-hearted Lady Dorcas!

Madame Mario's opening discourse deeply interested the audience in her story and herself.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—THE LOUNGER has another account of Cuisea, which he will risk room for next week.

"FRIEND LOUNGER.—Having seen in the columns of thy paper a notice of the School of Design in Peter Cooper's Institute, and having two young friends who would like to attend the evening classes, but have not where to apply to, I thought thee would have the kindness to inform me, or refer me to some address of the principal of the establishment; and perhaps thee would know how long it would be necessary to attend, in order to be able to enter to become a proficient in the art; or what sum would be required for tuition, at the expense of tuition.

"Will thee answer this through thy paper soon as convenient. RUTH.

November, 1858."

—Pupils who mean to devote themselves to drawing as a profession, or professional support are taught at the rate of five dollars a quarter for drawing, and ten dollars for painting. Mr. T. Addison Richards is the principal, and the person to address. "Will it be long for proficiency?" How long would it take a man of no talent to learn to paint like Titian? Ask the talented and unfortunate of the pupil must answer that question.

"MESSRS. FETRIDGE.—A friend and myself have had a dispute about the relative signification of the words 'or' and 'honesty;' and probably your Lounger can inform me whether a dishonorable man can be honest, or stor versa; or whether one can exist in the individual without the other. Respectfully,

"H. B., JUN."

—Honesty is rather a term applied to conduct, and honor to sentiment, when we compare them in this way. The bigger part them as of similar import. The word honor has also a derived, factitious meaning which applied to reputation. It is really the homage paid to worth; but it is perverted to mean a regard to conventional ideas of worth. Thus "a man of honor" according to "the code" might kill his best friend in a duel if he touched his nose, and be a man of honor, and clearly mean but one thing. An honest man can not be dishonorable, nor a truly honorable man—one who is loyal to moral rectitude—dishonest. But "a man of honor," in the technical sense, can very easily be a dishonest man. Among this latter class honor is a name and an appearance, not a reality. Aaron Burr was a man of honor, but he could hardly be called an honorable man.

—RECTOR HOUSE, of Philadelphia, begs the Lounger to use "his eloquent pen, and ask the assistance of other eloquent pens, to help persuade the ladies not to regard the publication of their names by crowned heads." But does R. H. suppose that there is any woman in Philadelphia or New York who would wear hoops with satisfaction a moment after hearing that England had restored the style to fashion?

—JOS. TURNER, D'Hartis, Medina County, Texas, desires the truth of the snake story told by Mr. Domenech in the Weekly of June 12. It seems to be a case of Touts.

—Hear the melancholy voice of "THOMAS JONES."

"DEVILS ISLAND, December, 1858.

"MR. LOUNGER,—I write to inquest to you, not 'the voice of nature,' but what you more frequently hear, the murmur of a man who, until a short year ago, was a gay bachelor.

"If I am ill-natured or peevish in the observations I may make from time to time, you must excuse me when I tell you that for the last three nights I have not 'slept a wink,' and have been kept in a state of misery by the cries of bad habits, and have been 'enjoying myself.' Yer see, Mr. Lounger, I married two, or, rather, was unwisely presented me with a son and heir. I was ejected from my respectable, but tiny apartment, and when I suggested that I was in the habit of taking a nap at night, and wished to have mine I could accommodate myself, I was told I might sleep on the floor if I had the heart to sleep under such circumstances—that I was a brute to think of sleep at all, that I had not the natural progeny that likelihoods so feelingly mentions—that, in fact, I had no right to sleep when I was not disturbed. For mine thus I was not allowed to see either the mother or the child. I was left to the tender ministrations of the maids of the 'Mary would not let me touch the bundle of hopes' for fear I should drop it, and, when I suggested that I did not fondle it and love it, they said I had no feeling. My present state is one of love without sight, and consequently refuse a sight.

"I am in a state of consolation, however, in thinking, privately, and very privately indeed, that the baby is a sight, and a sound, and a smell, and a noise, and I could be met with such a relief that I have given up in despair. I merely wished to say to you privately, Mr. Lounger, that, to know to what sex my offspring belonged, as I asked, 'What do they say?' 'Thing!' has been the reply. I wonder a thing!' was the only and indignant response of the insulted grandmother. I assure you, Mr. Lounger, all unfeeling as I feel to smaller lives my self-esteem are not so easy-goed as to warrant him in being so fond of sight.

"I would not grumble so much if I could be any existence when I got up in the night. I can do very little with power, as there is no a great deal of very little matters wherein I can not serve my boy (but, being a bachelor, I am not understand this.)"

Jones finally proposes to engage the Lounger to plead with his Mrs. Jones, and all other Mrs. Joneses, that they shall put their babies out to nurse.

"I agreed to you by all the ties that bound us when mutual sympathies were more fervent and warm. I know that in the kindness of your heart you will not refuse, and with the weight of your influence, I do not fear failure. Very respectfully,

"THOMAS JONES."

Has Thomas reflected that, according to his own statement, he is inviting a beholder to exhort the Mrs. Joneses to put out their infants? Why, Thomas, the Lounger would be covered with eclogue should he attempt it. Fancy Mrs. Jones receiving such a letter! "And pray, Sir, what on earth do you know about it?" Mr. Jones, having ceased to be a bachelor, has a right to speak.

—In his last volume Longfellow has a poem upon Newport. The Lounger, who knows the Lounger intimately, has written the other poet assisted in the composition.

TO NEWPORT.

I love this good old sea-port town,
That so close by the ocean lays!
This dear old town of mine,
Where I spent my boyish days.

I love its, quaint old-fashioned streets,
And its old New England ways—
The beauty and virtue one meets
Speak of the Puritan days.

Here a Berkley used to dwell—
From that rock, with paper and pen
To gratify his love to tell,
He wrote for the good of men.

In the quaint old cemetery
Of Charles the Second, the charters
And the island's peace it almost cost
For Proserpine's the name to baster.

But still, high on old Trinity's steeple,
On the topmost part of all,
A crown looks down on Columbia's people,
Where in peace they dwell.

The old mill, it stands on the hill
Where at hull we used to play
And the old wind mill, the top-rolling hill
Hurried us in fair weep.

For at midnight when the waves are high,
And strong blows and mist hides the sky,
Like a flock of moonlight flitting by,
"Angels"—so she said—"are Northman's bride.

And the hollow tramp is heard of him
Who o'er the wave was borne,
And once was seen, though the mist so dim,
With all his armor on.

But best of all thy charms, oh town!
To the stranger and to thee,
Is the balmy breath that comes down
From the great ocean in the sea.

Your lanes, green, and shaded beaches so fair,
The cooling glow of the sun in the sand,
The spouting horn, when the sea breaks there,
Fascinates Glen, Acquidneck, the beautiful land.

NARRAGANSETT.

VIEWS IN JAPAN.

We give herewith four pictures of Japan, from sketches made by officers attached to the embassies which have just succeeded in making their way into that empire.

One of our engravings gives a very fair view of the city of Jeddo, the capital. Some travellers who have recently visited Jeddo describe it as the finest city in that part of the world. Every nobleman and prince lives in a palace, and though the architecture of the palaces is subject to certain uniform laws, some of them are of such size that ten thousand retainers of the lord and master are sheltered under the same roof. They must be such edifices as the Roman nobles of the Imperial régime used to inhabit with their thousands of slaves. The correspondent of the London Times thus describes the city:

"The town stretches for miles round the bay. I suppose it is the largest in the world, for it covers more ground than London, with between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 of people, which, if I recollect right, is more than the London population. Jeddo, without exception, is one of the finest cities in the world; streets broad and good, and the Castle, which includes nearly the whole centre of the town, built on a slight eminence. There are three walls or inclosures round this quarter. Within the inner the Tycoon Emperor and heir-apparent live. The houses are built in regular order, forming wide streets some forty yards broad, kept in perfect order; an immense courtyard, with trees and gardens, forms the centre of each inclosure, in the midst of which is the house of the owner; the houses containing the followers, servants, stables, etc., form the large inclosure. They are built of one uniform shape. The gateways leading to the court-yard are exceedingly handsome, of massive wood-work, ornamented with lacquer and other devices. From the road that leads by the moat to the second wall is one of the finest views I ever recollect seeing—on one side of the Gulf of Jeddo, with the high hills rising beyond, while on the other is a portion of the great city of Jeddo, with its trees and gardens, picturesque temples, and densely crowded streets, extending as far as the eye can reach beyond the interior; then there is a view of the trees and green fields in the distance, far away beyond a thickly-built suburb; but the most striking view of all is that close by—the well-kept green banks of the second defence, rising some seventy feet from the broad moat below, with grand old cedars, over a hundred years of age, growing from its sides. The fine timber, the lay of the ground, the water-lilies in the moat, the grandeur, good order, and completeness of every thing, equal, and in some ways far surpass, any thing I have ever seen in Europe or any part of the world. We made an expedition into the country. The cottages were surrounded with neatly-clipped hedges; the private residences as well railed and kept as any place in England. The same completeness and finish exist in every thing."

A JAPANESE NOBLEMAN GOING A HUNTING.

Another of our engravings represents the Royal Palace or Castle at Jeddo. This building, or rather row of buildings, has been greatly admired by the visitors. A correspondent writes:

"The aristocratic quarter of Jeddo is wide and somewhat dreary, containing the residences of 300 hereditary princes, each a petty sovereign in his own right, many of them with half a dozen town houses, and some of them able to accommodate in the same mansions 10,000 retainers. Passing through the spacious and clean street, we arrive at the outer moat of the King's Palace: crossing it, we are still in the Princes' Quarter, but are astonished as we reach its farther limit at the scene which now bursts upon us—a magnificent moat, seventy or eighty yards broad, faced with a smooth green escarpment as many feet in height, above which runs a massive wall composed of stones, Cyclopean in their dimensions. This is crowned, in its turn, by a lofty palisade. Towering above all the spreading arms of giant cedars proudly display themselves, and denote that within the Imperial precincts the picturesque is not forgotten. From the highest point of the fortifications, in rear of the palace, a panoramic view is obtained of the vast city with its ten millions and a half inhabitants, and an area equal to, if not greater than, that of London. The palace alone is computed to be capable of containing 40,000 souls."

Of the Emperor himself, Mr. Harris, the United States Consul to Japan, gives the following information to a countryman:

"The Emperor is, as you may suppose, very rich, and yet I am positive that his table and clothing do not cost him $500 a year. Why that sum would not more than pay for the gloves of a Broadway dandy with us! You have doubtless seen the thick, soft matting with which the floors of their houses are covered? Well, the floors of the palace are covered in the same way, and this matting serves as the Emperor's bed, as well as that of the poorest house servant as the bed of the greatest subject. He stretches himself out, with a wooden pillow under his head, and sleeps a sleep rarely granted to his brother monarchs. To see a Japanese thus sleeping, with his head abruptly raised five or six inches, you would predict a stiff neck or torture spinal affection as a general result; and yet there is not a more healthy people living.

"What does the Emperor look like?" one of us asked.

"Quite a fine looking man, with a soft voice and pleasant smile. I suppose he is some thirty-five years old. In fact, I must be in for, as it is considered polite in Japan to ask one his age and how many children he has, I was, of course, polite. Poor fellow! He has what one of us would consider a miserable life. He does not leave the palace but once in two years: and then as he passes through the town, every one must leave the streets and close the doors and windows of their houses. Their custom does not allow them even to look at him. This is the temporal Emperor at Yeddo, of whom I now speak; the case of the spiritual Emperor at Shiera is even worse; for he never leaves his palace. He is venerated so much that they can not even run the risk of his being looked upon by the crowd."

Our other engravings will give some idea of social life at Japan. One of them, from a Japanese sketch, represents a nobleman and his suite going a hunting. A propos of this picture, and of the Japanese dogs, a correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger says:

"You would have laughed had you seen the expression of Cimmo-no-kami's face when I told him, during my second visit to Yedo, of a strange fact concerning dogs. You've heard it, I suppose, but he had not. I said to him: 'Cimmo-no-kami, do you know that if you see a dog with a white spot upon any part of his body, that the end of his tail will also have a white spot?' He thought first that he had not understood me, but when the question was repeated to him, he looked singularly puzzled. 'It is, of course, a joke of yours,' he at length replied. 'Not at all,' was my answer. 'Send out now and bring in all the spotted dogs you can find, and I'll convince you before dinner.' Of course, there was a dozen dogs with more or less white spots about them introduced in a very short time, and, as I had expected, they all had white tips to their tails. Cimmo-no-kami examined them all himself, looked more puzzled than ever, and finally said that 'these dogs certainly uphold the story, but that he would find a dozen before the next day that would refute it.' I laughed, and told him that the whole of Yedo wouldn't produce such a dog, and he said: 'Well, we will see.' So you may imagine the white-spotted dog-hunt which came off that evening. Still they failed to find the one they wanted. It soon got to the Emperor's ears, and finally became the talk of Yedo. One day they thought they had me. A dog was dragged into my room in a most triumphant manner.

"'See here!' exclaimed Cimmo-no-kami, 'here is a dog with a white spot on his back and a black hill! What do you say to that?'

"'Part the hairs on the end of his tail, and tell me what you see,' I replied. They did so, and looked up with a disappointed air. They had discovered some milk-white hairs on the very tip, that had been concealed by the outer ones. After that they gave it up."

The habits of the Japanese are singular, according to correspondents. One writes:

"In their personal cleanliness the Japanese present a marked contrast to the Chinese; no deformed objects meet the eye in the crowded streets; cutaneous diseases seem almost unknown. In Nagasaki, toward evening a large portion of the male and female population might be seen innocently 'tubbing' at the corners of the streets. In Jeddo they frequent large bathing establishments, the door of which is open to the passer-by, and presents a curious spectacle, more especially if the inmates of both sexes ingeniously rush to it to gaze at him as he rides ploddingly past."

Another says:

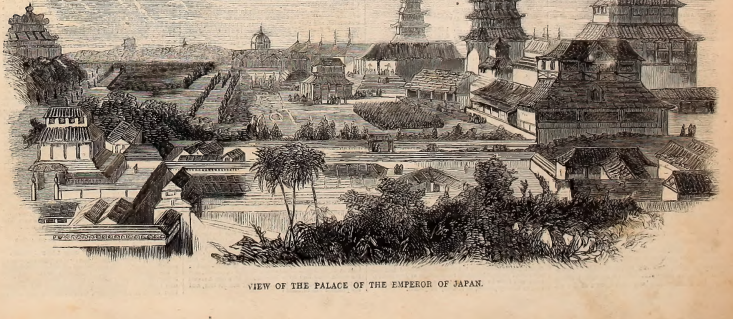
"Every Japanese is allowed one legal wife, but he may have as many 'second wives' as his means will admit of. The manner in which they obtain their 'second wives' is regulated by law. It must first be proved that the girl's relatives are unable to support her, and then she may become a 'second wife,' in order to avoid begging. The children are all adopted by the legal wife, and thus you find hundreds of Japanese who do not know their own mothers. You were wondering a while since at the great number of children that crowd around us wherever we stop; this is because they all do know their own fathers—something like your Mormons in the United States."

JAPANESE LADIES.

AN INCIDENT.

IT was the Indian Summer,
Blue and golden was the sky,
When on a prison scaffold
A gaily youth stood to die,
For a deed of murder done
In his drunken revelry.

He glanced upon the faces
Of those who stood around,
But in their serious aspect
No kindred being found;
For his deadly crime had severed
The bonds that Nature bound.



One last look on the heavens,
Which smiled as they were wont
When his loving parents held him
At the baptismal font—
Then, a little guiltless infant;
Now, a felon—horror gaunt!

One last thought of the meadows,
One last look at the sun,
And then his eyes are blinded—
The work of death 's begun;
A few convulsed sharp pangs and then
The work of death is done!

Swinging idly, like vile carrion,
In the face of day so fair—
His body faintly quivering,
Eyes fixed in death's grim stare—
He hangs, a blighting horror,
To poison God's sweet air.

And ye who read this story,
Though ye now so proudly throng
The siren halls of pleasure,
Ye may stumble into wrong;
Temptation 's bright and sudden—
Suffering is dark and long!

Even the noblest of the nation,
The proudest in the land,
Ye who boast a spotless honor,
Yet may bear the felon's brand
Unless ye have the courage
The wine-cup to withstand!

VIEW OF THE PALACE OF THE EMPEROR OF JAPAN.

LITERARY.

Carter & Brothers are first in the field with two of the most superb Gift Books ever offered to the appreciation of the public. The Book of Proverbs has been supposed incapable of illustration; but Gilbert, the well-known artist, has achieved a success in this instance which is worthy of unqualified praise. The idea which so impresses us, and which we are very certain will attract the attention of all lovers of art, is the illustrating of the book of wise sayings by scenes in history which prove the truth and wisdom of those sayings. "A wise son maketh a glad father" finds its illustration in the welcome which the princely Joseph gives to his old father coming down to Egypt. "I discerned among the youths a young man void of understanding" is obviously made true in the story of the Prodigal Son. But Mr. Gilbert has not confined himself to sacred history; and no one of the pages in the book strikes the reader with greater force, on account of its fitness, than that in which the passage "Seest thou a man diligent in his business? He shall stand before kings," is shown to be the truth in the picture of Benjamin Franklin at the French court before the King and his courtiers. On the whole, we think this book justifies some degree of enthusiasm in a notice of it, and that it will prove one of the most acceptable of the tributes of Art to the holiday season. It is a companion to the "Book of Job," published last year by the same house; and, like that, is a fine specimen of typography, as well as of luxury in binding that would have enchanted Grolier.

The other book which Carter & Brothers publish is in the same splendid style of typography, illustration, and binding. It is Lays of the Holy Land, from ancient and modern poets, with illustrations (from drawings and photographs), which equal, if they do not surpass, in execution any specimens of wood-engraving hitherto seen. Of the delicacy and accuracy of the drawings we are able also to speak with perfect satisfaction. Bethany stands on the page before us; Tyre is here in very truth; the water seems to ripple in the Pool of Siloam. No work of any kind that we have hitherto met with, not excepting Roberts's large plates, approaches the fidelity of these exquisite little cuts. But, besides these, there are not a few which exhibit the great advance of modern art in engraving. We can not avoid the mention of a plate illustrating the Finding of Moses, by Millais, finished up with Pre-Raphaelite care, and indicating a most careful study of the Egyptian monuments and woman nature. Why should not an Egyptian princess, three thousand years ago, lift up her dress, when she steps toward the muddy edge of the rushes, with the air and fashion of a Parisian lady crossing the Rue de la Paix? We like that picture much; and though the artists do much dispute about it, and call it a picture of the Egyptian lady's tournure instead of the Finding of Moses, it is nevertheless a page to study and enjoy. As to the letter-press, it is only necessary to remind the reader that among the finest poems in our language are those which are strictly Lays of the Holy Land. We are especially pleased at meeting here some old favorites long out of print, now most fitly preserved in these gorgeous covers, which can not be too rich and magnificent for such contents. Who can read or think those lines of Bernard de Morlo,

"To thee, oh! dear, dear country, Mine eyes their vigils keep," without weeping? Already we have passed an evening in repeating these glorious old hymns and poems of the great men who, in all times, have sung the glory and the sorrow of Jerusalem.

Songs of the Woodland, the Garden, and the Sea, is the title of A. D. F. Randolph's contribution to the holiday table—a book of rich poems, illustrated with colored engravings, copied close after Nature in her dead leaves, crimson and brown and golden; her flowers of infinite variety; and, above all, the varied and delicate beauty of her sea-mosses. The volume itself consists of a selection from all the poets of Nature, and the combination of Poetry and Art is a success, which makes this a book to which lovers of Nature will turn with especial pleasure.

We note with pleasure that in this volume Mr. Randolph has preserved some fugitive pieces of rhyme which have been traveling anonymously up and down the country, and which deserve the elegant resting-place he furnishes them. The selection is made with taste and judgment.

Dust and Foam is the life, for ten years, of a rollicking, jovial sailor. Published by Scribner. Mr. Warren, the author, left New York in 1849 for California, in one of those ships which many will recollect were bought by parties of young men and fitted out for the gold regions. He was President of his company. At Rio he resigned, and took passage on one of the old Long Island Sound steamers, which was sent around to San Francisco, and on her he had a perilous and eventful voyage. Thus he commenced a life which, in the following years, led him up and down the west coast, to the various groups of Pacific islands, to Australia and East Indian islands, and to and fro in the Pacific Ocean generally. His story is told simply, frankly, and sometimes with thrilling effect. We have not often met with a book so thoroughly attractive. He writes freely, without much polish; but one fancies as he reads that he hears the sailor telling his yarns, and it is vain to resist the frequent impulse to shout with merriment over the adventures of the free-and-easy American, who seems to have been always the same "jolly mariner," in a gale of wind with the ship gaining on the pumps hour by hour, as in the groves of the Pacific islands, among the dark beauties of the Kanakas. "Dust and Foam" is certainly a very readable book.

It is not often that a new poet is born; for, the old saying to the contrary notwithstanding, poets generally grow, and are not produced Minerva-like. But we have certainly an exception before us. Dr. Holland has long been known as the author of "The Bay Path," an admirable American novel, and more recently as the writer of "The Letters of Timothy Titcomb," of which we recently spoke favorably. We presume no one judged from either of these books that the author was or would be a poet. But Mr. Scribner publishes now Bitter Sweet, on the title-page of which, with a boldness he need not be ashamed of, the author has placed his name in full, and we have no hesitation in transferring it to the list of acknowledged poets. "Bitter Sweet" is a remarkable work. Running through it is a story of exceeding beauty. The scene is a New England Thanksgiving at a farm-house, and the actors are the returning children who gather at the old place. The theory of the book is that children of any farm-house, who go out into the world, bring home the same lessons of human nature that kings and warriors learn in higher spheres. So on a Thanksgiving evening Ruth, and Grace, and David, and Mary talk and tell their stories one to another, and the children play, and there is a scene at the end that suddenly lets you into the secret of the whole. Easy versification and admirable use of language are among the least merits of the poem. There is a keen perception of the beautiful, a far-seeing religious philosophy, and a knowledge of all that is beautiful in the golden rules of the Christian faith which Dr. Holland possesses; and to these he adds the ability of the true poet to think and to write. Hence a book is produced which takes high rank at once.

We shall not pause to speak of faults—for that there are such is a matter of necessity; but the pervading beauty of the whole at present forbids our thinking of these, and we prefer the more agreeable duty of the critic in pointing out the merits. In one part of the story Ruth and David go down into the cellar to draw a pitcher of cider; and this same cellar invasion gives the author the opportunity for one of the finest portions of the book. Not to speak of the vividness with which, in passing, the scene itself is laid before the mind, the barrels and the bins, Ruth calls David's attention to one and another of the stores, and David thereupon moralizes; and between the two we have as artistic a passage as the mind of a poet has ever conceived. We regret our want of space to give specimens.

The Household Waverley of Ticknor & Fields continues in regular succession, and approaches completion. The "Fair Maid of Perth" is the last issue, and the whole set seems to have been made with reference to the ordinary width of a drawing-room book-case, of which it will fill one shelf exactly.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

MR. COBB'S BUDGET.

Mr. Secretary Cobb has completed his official estimates of the Federal Expenditures for the fiscal year, commencing on the 1st of July next. He puts those Expenditures at $73,217,947—a little over seventy-three millions of dollars. Here are his items:

Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous, including expenses of collecting the revenues from sales of public lands and expenses of courts....	$11,629,535 11
To supply deficiencies in the revenues of the General Post-Office	6,382,000 00
Pensions............................	852,000 00
Indian Department........................	1,866,419 49
Army, proper, etc., including miscellaneous objects........................	15,658,886 28
Military Academy........................	185,938 00
Fortifications, ordnance, etc.............	2,165,766 00
Naval establishment	13,500,370 00
Total..............................	$52,241,315 78

To the estimates are added statements showing:

1. The appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1860, made by former Acts of Congress, of a specific and indefinite character, as follows:
Miscellaneous, including expenses of collecting revenue from customs.	$5,624,410 14
Compensation to the General Post-office for mail services	700,000 00
Arming and equipping the militia..................	200,000 00
Civilization of Indians......	10,000 00
Interest on the public debt...	1,963,314 36
		$8,497,724 50
2. The existing appropriations, part of which are required for the payment of the liabilities of the present fiscal year, but which will not be drawn from the Treasury until after June 30, 1859, and the balance applied to the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1860, viz.:
Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous	$4,270,957 24
Interior Department (pensions and Indians)	1,603,602 83

Navy Department	3,243,255 45
		12,478,907 28
Total.........................		$73,217,947 46

MR. BUCHANAN ON THE DANGERS OF THE UNION.

Mr. Buchanan has written a letter to the Fort Duquesne Committee, in which the dangers of the Union are thus portrayed: "I regret to say that the present omens are far from propitious. In the last age of the republic it was considered almost treasonable to pronounce the word disunion. Times have since sadly changed, and now disunion is freely prescribed as the remedy for evanescent evils, real or imaginary, which, if left to themselves, would speedily vanish away in the progress of events.

"Our Revolutionary fathers have passed away, and the generation next after them, who were inspired by their personal counsel and example, have nearly all disappeared. The present generation, deprived of these lights, must, whether they will or not, decide the fate of their posterity. Let them cherish the Union in their heart of hearts—let them resist every measure which may tend to relax or dissolve its bonds—let the citizens of different States cultivate the feelings of kindness and forbearance toward each other—and let all resolve to transmit it to their descendants in the form and spirit they have inherited it from their forefathers; and all will then be well for our country in future times.

"I shall assume the privilege of advancing years in reference to another growing and dangerous evil. In the last age, although our fathers, like ourselves, were divided into political parties which often had severe conflicts with each other, yet we never heard, until within a recent period, of the employment of money to carry elections. Should this practice increase until the voters and their representatives in the State and national Legislatures shall become infected, the fountain of free government will then be poisoned at its source, and we must end, as history proves, in military despotism.

"A democratic republic, all agree, can not long survive unless sustained by public virtue. When this is corrupted, and the people become venal, there is a canker at the root of the tree of liberty which will cause it to wither and to die."

NO PROTECTION FOR FOREIGN JEWS.

The following letter of the venerable Secretary of State has been written in reply to a letter from Mr. Abraham Hart, the President of a Hebrew congregation in the city of Philadelphia:

"Sir,—I have received and submitted to the President your letter of the 19th instant, respecting the alleged forcible abduction from his parents of a Jewish child by the public authorities of Bologna, in the Papal dominions, and asking some expressions of condemnation on the part of this Government

"This occurrence took place within the territories of an independent power, and without affecting the rights of any American citizen. It is the settled policy of the United States to abstain from an interference in the internal concerns of any other country. Certainly there is nothing in the circumstances of this case, as they are reported, which would impose this reserve upon the Government. But it is deemed proper to adhere to the established principle which has heretofore regulated its conduct in its intercourse with other nations.

"Lewis Cass.

"To Mr A. Hart, President of the Congregation 'Mickve Israel,' Cherry Street, Philadelphia."

A NOBLE HERO.

We read in the New Haven Register: "The recent courageous and even desperate act of Captain Brooks, keeper of the Faulkner's Island Light, in rescuing the captain, his wife, and crew, from a wreck, in Long Island Sound, deserves more than a passing notice. It will be remembered that Faulkner's Island itself is more than two miles from land, and that its only inhabitants are the keeper of the light-house and his family, Captain Oliver N. Brooks. The wreck lay upon Goose Island, some two miles from this; but Captain Brooks could see, with his glass, the persons in the rigging, and the sea lashed into unusual fury, making a breach high over its decks, and threatening instant destruction. It was too sad a sight for the brave man to endure; and provided as he was by Government with nothing but a small sailboat, to go between the island and the main land, he would have been fully justified in leaving them to a fate horrible to think of. His wife was on shore, and he was alone with his family of little children; but telling them of the peril he was about to assume—a fearful peril, from which he might never return—he kissed them, and calling upon God to protect them and bless his endeavor he jumped into his frail skiff, and steered boldly into the storm and the billows. Those on board saw the attempt, and even in their agony wondered at his boldness, predicted its failure, and grieved at what they considered an unnecessary sacrifice. But still the brave man, relying upon Providence, kept up his heart and hopes, and although every wave threatened him with destruction, he reached at last the wreck, and hailed the desponding crew with words of cheer.

THE RESCUE.

"By the most skillful management of his boat, now shooting past, and once over the very wreck itself, he at last managed to pick them off, one at a time, and then turned for the shore. But it was only by constant bailing and tremendous efforts that the boat was kept above water, and at last reached the island, with its inmates exhausted, and nearly dead with hunger and exposure. On the shore, waiting for their father, were the little children of Captain Brooks, who, with tears and screams of joy, saw the boat tossed violently upon the land by the angry waves, with its overtasked load of rescued mariners, who were immediately transferred to the light-house residence, and made welcome and comfortable. A gentleman familiar with the circumstances, and also with the dangers of the sea, assures us that it was the most daring feat he ever read of, that the boat was entirely unfit for such a service, and that nothing but unrivaled coolness, great skill as a boatman, and the hand of Providence over all, made the effort successful. Captain B. thought it at least an equal chance that he should be lost; though, with a proper life or surf-boat, he wouldn't have hesitated an instant about going to the wreck when he first discovered the danger, and might have saved the life of the little girl—the captain's child of three years—who fell from his exhausted arms into the sea, half an hour before Captain B. reached the wreck. We have known Captain Brooks for several years as one of the most faithful men in the light-house service, and means will be taken to call the attention of the Government to his merits, and hope that he may be provided with a boat suitable for the kind of service he is so frequently called upon to enter. There should be also, at such an exposed point, an assistant keeper; for had Mr. Brooks been lost in his effort to save the crew of this vessel, there would have been missing to the mariner in Long Island Sound, on that night, the ever-steady beacon-light of Faulkner's Island. If ever hero deserved the public reward of bravery, that man is Oliver N. Brooks, the solitary watcher on a sea-girt island."

A CONVICT SHOWERED TO DEATH.

A colored convict was showered to death in the Auburn Prison on 3d. The convicts, having gained information of the fact, became greatly excited, and a general rebellion was feared. The convicts in the shop where the colored man worked went to their cells shouting and hallooing. No disturbance took place during the night.

A NUN RELEASED BY THE POPE.

The Washington correspondent of the Traveller has the following, relating to a dispensation granted by the Pope, through American official influence:

"While the papers are full of comments on General Cass's letter of refusal to interfere in the Mortara affair, on the ground that 'it is the settled policy of the United States to abstain from all interference in the internal concerns of other countries,' it may be well to 'ventilate' a rumor now current in this city. It is said that the daughter of a highly respectable family of this city (in which, by-the-way, ex-President Pierce was quite intimate) took the vail at the convent in the adjacent city of Georgetown, and that after a while she found the vows distasteful, and that by the personal, if not official, interference of President Pierce, Major Lewis Cass, Jun., Minister near the Court of Rome, was induced to interest himself in the matter, and, by his personal intercession with the Pope, to obtain a 'dispensation,' which has released the young nun from her vows, and has allowed her to again enter the world. If this be so—and it has obtained credence among many—it would appear that 'intervention' can be practiced whenever there is sufficient occasion for its exercise."

LUCKY WINDFALL.

According to the Cumberland (Maryland) Alleganian, an old man named John Brobst, living in the Glades, in that county, recently discovered that he was the rightful owner of a large tract of land in the richest mineral region of Pennsylvania, underlaid with immense seams of coal and iron, and valued at $8,000,000. Brobst, it is said, lived on the land fifty years ago, became involved through his brother, mortgaged his property to its then full value, and came to Maryland, where he has ever since lived in indigent circumstances. The property subsequently passed into the hands of his nephews, who afterward sold it to a wealthy company. The difficulty of giving a good title led to the fact that Brobst was still alive. He was searched out, found, and taken on to Pennsylvania, and, according to the Alleganian, has sold out all his right for the sum of $2,000,000.

STRANGE PRESENTIMENT.

At the Nail Factory, South Troy, on Sunday week, a lad six years of age died of croup, having suffered terribly for several days. Two days before his death he called his father to his bedside, and told him that he was not going to live, for he had a beautiful dream when he was asleep that told him so. He dreamed that he stood upon the earth, he saw God in heaven looking sweetly down upon him; that He let down a golden chain, which fell upon the ground at his feet; and that, as he stooped to look at it, God told him to take hold of the chain, and He would draw him up to heaven and give him a crown of gold. Sunday week the little spirit was set free, and the promise was fulfilled!

A LITTLE HEROINE.

Dr. Holmes told the story of the heroine of his poem, "Avis," at the close of a lecture in Charlestown recently. It seems that a little colored girl was brought to the State Industrial School for Girls, at Lancaster, in such a state of disease as to present a most revolting spectacle to all connected with the establishment. It seemed as if nobody would care to touch her, or could look at her without disgust and dread. Under these circumstances "Avis" volunteered to take charge of her, and did so night and day, "giving body and soul to her," as Dr. Holmes says, until she was restored to life and health.

A MAN WALKING ABOUT WITH HIS HEAD OFF.

The Detroit Free Press says: "An accident occurred in a pottery in the lower end of Fort Street, in the outskirts of the city, some days since, resulting in the death of an employé of the establishment, which furnishes a most singular instance of the tenacity with which life clings at times to the human frame. The man, whose name we have been unable to ascertain, was engaged in the room where the machinery employed in cutting and pulverizing the clay is situated. This machine is a large wheel, with heavy knives or cutters placed at equal distance on its circumference. Some disarrangement of the wheel attracted the attention of the unfortunate man, who attempted to reach into the wheel and adjust it while it was still revolving. In this, however, he miscalculated the speed at which the machinery was running, and, before he could withdraw himself from under the knife, it struck him on the back of the head, low down in the neck, completely severing the upper and back portion of the skull, on a line close to the top of the ears, and cutting through and removing a considerable portion of the brain. The most singular circumstance was that the man, in this horribly wounded condition, walked into an adjoining apartment where other workmen were, and afterward walked to a carriage, in which he rode to his home, surviving the accident nearly half a day. We doubt if another case of such extreme tenacity of life can be found in the records of accidents, but the actual occurrence of the above circumstance is vouched for by competent authorities, and is beyond a doubt."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

ANOTHER WORLD'S FAIR IN ENGLAND.

An English journal says: "It seems that we are to have another Great Exhibition in 1861, on the same plan but with a larger basis than that which drew so many millions of people to London in 1851. If this undertaking should at all approach in success the former one, the probability, almost the certainty is, that it will be continued decennially. Mr. C. W. Dilke, who was mixed up so largely with the last one, is the primary mover in the new undertaking. At present the speculation is hardly launched. A preliminary inquiry will take place by the Council of the Society of Arts—first, to ascertain whether the Commissioners in the former exhibition will consent to act again, and if not, how far they will assist the new undertaking."

PRINCE ALFRED ON HIS OWN HOOK.

The sailors of the Euryalus have an anecdote among them to the effect that two of the midshipmen, during the voyage to Lisbon, blackened Prince Alfred's face, while he was asleep in his berth, in that spirit of mischief for which these young gentlemen are notorious. The Prince made no complaint, but was up like a skylark before gun-fire next morning, and cut away the hammock-strings of the two young gentlemen who had served him so, taking the law into his own hands in true sailor fashion.

DEATH OF ROBERT OWEN.

The famous Socialist, Robert Owen, is dead. His son, Mr. R. Dale Owen, in a letter to a friend, thus describes the last scene in the life of his father:

"It is all over. My dear father passed away this morning at 6¾ o'clock, and passed away as gently and quietly as if he had been falling asleep. There was not the least struggle—not a contraction of a limb or muscle—not an expression of pain on his face. His breath gradually became slower and slower, until, at last, it ceased so imperceptibly that even as I held his hand I could scarcely tell the moment when he no longer breathed. His last words, distinctly pronounced about twenty minutes before his death, were, 'Relief has come.' About half an hour before, he said, 'Very easy and comfortable.'

"His great object appeared to be to convince us that he did not suffer, and that he was satisfied with our attentions to him. He is to be buried on Monday next, in the same vault in which his father and mother lie. The rector, Mr. John Edwards, who has kindly called upon him five or six times since he has been here, will officiate."

MR. MORPHY TO SPEND THE WINTER IN EUROPE.

An English journal says: "Mr. Morphy has yielded to the earnest solicitations of his numerous friends in France and England, and has elected to pass the winter in Europe. His decision can not fail of giving a still greater stimulus to European chess. Herr Andersson, also, has made final arrangements for being in Paris on the 12th of December; so that this much-expected match will really come off. After its termination we shall probably again see Mr. Morphy in England; and plans, we know, are already afloat for giving him the reception he merits."

STAUNTON PERCEIVES THAT MORPHY HAS WRITTEN A LETTER.

The following letter appears in the Illustrated London News:

"Sir,—My attention has at this moment been directed to a passage in a letter of Lord Lyttelton to Mr. Morphy, wherein allusion is made to the 'suppression' of a portion of Mr. Morphy's letter to me, which you published, together with my answer, in your paper for October 23. I have not seen the epistle to which Lord Lyttelton's is a reply; but I plead guilty at once to having omitted, when sending you Mr. Morphy's jeremiad and my answer, a couple of paragraphs from the former. My reasons for omitting them were, in the first place, because they appeared to me to be irrelevant to the main point between Mr. Morphy and me; secondly, because I knew if the letters extended very much beyond the limited space you apportion to Chess, they were pretty certain of being omitted, or, as Mr. Morphy phrases it, 'suppressed' altogether; and thirdly, because I had already written to a friend in Paris, with whom, through my introduction, Mr. Morphy was living upon intimate terms, an explanation touching the notice Mr. Morphy professes to be so concerned at; and from my friend's reply, which intimated that Mr. Morphy was about to write to me in an amicable spirit, I of course supposed there was an end to the matter, and that I should be permitted to pursue my work, and this young gentleman his play, without further misunderstanding. That, after this, and in the face of my endeavors through your journal to set his blindfold and other chess exploits before the public in the most advantageous light—in the face of every civility which in the extent of my opportunities I have endeavored to show him from the first moment of his arrival in this country—he could reconcile it to his sense of honor and honesty to impute to me a willful suppression of any portion of his letter, does, indeed, amaze me, and I can only account for it by supposing he is under the influence of very ill advisers, or that his idea of what is honorable and honest is very different from what I had hoped and believed it to be.

"I am, Sir, yours, etc.,

"H. Staunton.

THE DUKE OF MALAKOFF AND LADY JERSEY.

The Times correspondent says: "We have every day some new story of the strange and capricious brusquerie of the Duke of Malakoff. The last on dit is, that Lady Jersey, having undertaken to make a favorable impression upon him, had persisted in detaining him longer than usual in conversation, without having any thing very new or particular to say. His interest in her ladyship's sentimentalisms speedily died out; for a time he listened on in silence, and then yawned undisguisedly, though without effect, and, in short, made every sign which he could think of that he was thoroughly bored. The patroness of Almack's and faded queen of fashion still, however, persevered, and began at length to explain to him why she believed that every period of life had its compensating happiness. His Excellency could resist no longer, and to her ladyship dryly said: 'I dare say you are right, and you must be a good judge, for I have heard that when young you were very beautiful; that always you have been very rich; that you have had many children, and now, when you are old, you have only one daughter left upon your hands.'

"The last piece of this explosion was perhaps the hardest to bear, as the still beautiful, but now almost passé Lady Clementina Villiers, after having been talked of as the probable bride of some of the first nobles in the land, remains still unmarried."

RAREY'S TOUR IN THE NORTH.

A London paper contains the following: "Mr. Rarey has once more returned to London, and the confederacy is dissolved between him and Mr. Goodenough, who departed for Canada about two months since. The former gentleman has spent about eighteen or twenty days in Lapland, and instructed a class of two hundred at Stockholm, on his way back here. As in England, he numbered several of the Swedish ministers among his pupils, and gave a grand exhibition in the Royal Riding-School before the Crown Prince and his suite. Two subjects were brought to him; one, a well-bred colt of four or five years old, as wild and nervous as a roe-deer, and which had never had any thing but a halter on. This one occupied him forty minutes, and the process of giving it confidence was so interesting that the whole company rose from their chairs almost at the outset, and never resumed them till he rode it round the ring and played with it at his will. The second was a bay half-bred Arab mare, whose hind feet no man had ever yet been able to shoe, and whom only one groom in Sweden durst approach. Biting and hind-leg vice were her peculiar 'vanities,' and she was so violent when she was led into the ring and delivered over to him that, at one time, several of the spectators feared she would make a summary end of him. However, he was not to be daunted, and assured the Crown Prince that he had been beaten by no horse yet, and that if he could find one to defy him his whole system must be a deception. The result proved that he had not misjudged his power, as he brought her cleverly to hand in an hour and twenty minutes. The Crown Prince then stepped forward, shook hands with him most warmly, and presented him with a gold medal as a memento of his victory. The system seems to be creating quite as much enthusiasm on the Continent as it did in England, and Mr. Rarey and Cruiser bid fair to be in modern what Alexander and Bucephalus were in ancient history. We believe that there is every probability of his being engaged by the Government to instruct the army rough-riders. A commission has been appointed to investigate his system, and it is understood that they have reported most favorably."

THE THACKERAY AND YATES QUARREL.

A case which promises to be of considerable interest in literary and club circles, and which will raise an important and novel point, is to be tried by one of the common law courts at Westminster. It arises out of the dispute between Mr. Thackeray and Mr. Edmund Yates, both members of the Garrick Club, which arose out of circumstances already laid before the readers of the Weekly. Mr. Yates having declined to retract the statements he had made in the Town Talk, with regard to Mr. Thackeray, the latter submitted the correspondence which had passed between Mr. Yates and himself, together with the copy of the article to which he had taken exception, to the Committee of the Garrick Club. Mr. Yates having heard that Mr. Thackeray had adopted this course, wrote to ask the committee to suspend their judgment until he could prepare his own version of the case; and subsequently wrote to the committee questioning their right to entertain the matter at all. "The article," he said, "may be in exceedingly bad taste, but the committee is not a committee of taste." The committee, at a special meeting, resolved that it was competent to them to entertain Mr. Thackeray's complaint, that the complaint itself was well grounded, and that the practice of publishing such articles, being reflections by one member of the club against any other, would be fatal to the comfort of the club, and intolerable in a society of gentlemen. The committee further resolved that Mr. Yates was bound to make "an ample apology," or retire from the club. Mr. Yates declined either to retire or to apologize, and stated he would appeal to a general meeting on two questions—first, whether the case between Mr. Thackeray and himself was such a case as should be submitted to the committee at all; and, secondly, "Whether Mr. Thackeray has any right to call for an apology from me when he had so arrogantly and coarsely addressed me." The result was that Mr. Yates's subscription was returned, and it was intimated to him that he was expelled the club. He has therefore instituted an action against the committee for trespass, in refusing to allow him to enter the club, and this will raise the important question, as affecting the rights of members generally, whether the club had the right to expel Mr. Yates or not. It is understood that there will be a large array of legal talent on both sides. The Attorney-General has been retained for the committee of the Garrick Club. Mr. Edwin James, Q.C., is to lead the case on behalf of the plaintiff, Mr. Edmund Yates.

THACKERAY'S OPINION OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Paris correspondent of the Boston Transcript writes: "A few evenings ago I had the pleasure of meeting at the house of a mutual friend the satirist of the day, 'Thackeray,' whose lectures in your principal cities drew together such large audiences some time since. During the course of the conversation a young American lady present said to Mr. Thackeray, 'I have been long afraid to see issuing from your pungent pen a rather severe book upon the United States and the American people.' 'You need fear no such thing, my dear madam,' replied the tall author, 'for I promised I would not write such a book, and after the kindness I received at the hands of all in America, I am sure I could not be so ungrateful as to say ill of the people that made me feel so much at home.' So I may safely predict that the author of 'Pendennis,' 'Vanity Fair,' etc., will not give to the world such a trying-to-be-smart-and-funny-and-missing-it-ever-so-much book as Dickens's Notes on America."

MARRIAGE OF THE RICHEST GIRL IN ENGLAND.

We read in an English paper: "On Wednesday, at the church of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, the Hon. Miss Loyd, the only daughter of Lord Overstone, bestowed her hand on Major Robert Lindsay, of the Scots Fusilier Guards. The building was completely crammed, every coigne of vantage seized, eager eyes were gazing through the fly-lights of the old-fashioned doors, expectation was at its height, when, shortly after the termination of morning prayer, the entry of two or three elegantly-attired ladies into the church proclaimed the first arrival. They were followed in rapid succession by others of the wedding party, whose dress, we are afraid, continued to be a subject of greater discussion than the personal merits of the wearers, till the entrance of the gallant bridegroom, accompanied by his 'best man,' attracted all attention to himself. The bride was soon afterward led by her father to the altar. Her extreme beauty, heightened by her agitation, was universally regarded with the most respectful admiration. The scene at this moment was brilliant in the extreme. At the termination of the marriage service the party was shown into the vestry, where the usual signatures were affixed to the parochial register, after which the new-made wife, resting on her husband's arm, passed down the aisle to the carriage which awaited them. Here the prettiest part of the day's proceedings took place, the children of the parish, ranged on each side holding baskets of flowers, strewed the path with their contents, when, amidst the joyous clashing of the bells, and the gratulations of their friends, the newly-wedded couple, after partaking of an elegant déjeûner at the residence of Lord Overstone, in Carlton Terrace, proceeded on the customary marriage tour. The ceremony was performed by the very Rev. the Dean of Litchfield, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Humphreys, vicar of the parish. The bride was attired in a white satin dress elegantly trimmed with lace, the bridal vail was of the most costly material, and was confined to the back of her head by a wreath of orange blossoms. The bridesmaids were costumed in white silk, with cashmere cloaks of the same color, plain bonnets with white feathers tipped with ruby, with which color in velvet the whole costume was relieved."

FANATIC ASSAULT ON HOOPS.

The Liverpool Mercury gives the following account of an outrage committed on the person of a young lady near Liverpool: "A young lady, about twenty, of slender frame, reduced by a fever, from the results of which she is slowly regaining convalescence, was proceeding along Boundary Road, when there came toward her two men, the taller one of whom extended a large pocket knife, and exclaiming, 'Look, look, look!' jerked it open. He then said, 'That's to cut the ropes;' and she, presuming that crinoline was meant, at once confessed that she had not any. The taller man affirmed that she had, holding the knife over her; and the lesser man grasped her shoulder tightly with his hand, and commenced pushing her across the road. There was no one within sight at the time, so that a show of resistance, or a call for help, seemed hopeless. The taller man repeatedly said, 'I must cut them;' and the lesser man, who also produced an open knife, said, 'If you make the least resistance I shall stick the knife through you,' at the same time pointing the blade toward the young lady's breast. The lesser man, still holding the young lady by the shoulder, pointed the knife to her bosom, and repeating the threats he had previously made, the taller man raised her dress, grasped her petticoats, and commenced cutting with the knife. Two women were heard approaching, whereupon the men renewed their threats with emphatic impressiveness. The skirts and dress were temporarily dropped; both men stood in front of her as if in conversation; and the women passed by, looking with curiosity, but without suspicion of the outrage that had been temporarily suspended. When they had passed, the dress was again lifted up, and the underskirts cut just in the same way as before; and subsequent examination showed that three skirts had been cut through, the cuts in each being about a foot in length. After completing their work, they replaced the victorine which had been turned round, straightened the lady's cloak, and did all in their power to set right her disordered dress; and then, saying something about catching the omnibus which was heard approaching, they politely took their leave, both wishing her 'Good-by' with apparent reluctance."

ARREST OF A MAN FOR A MURDER COMMITTED THIRTY-THREE YEARS AGO.

A man has been apprehended at Fleur-de-lys, in Monmouthshire, charged with committing a murder in one of the Welsh counties thirty-three years ago. The circumstances of the case, so far as they are at present reported, are briefly these: In or about the year 1826 a man named Thomas Price, alleged to be the prisoner, lived in Carmarthenshire, where he was paying his addresses to a young Welsh woman. Another young man, named Lewis Williams, became attached to the same girl, and frequent quarrels arose between the rivals through the coincidence of their choice. The girl herself seems to have first encouraged one and then the other, but exhibited no decided or permanent preference for either, and this increased the ill-feeling between Price and Williams. At length they agreed to "fight out" the dispute in a field, and both repaired there alone for the purpose. A struggle took place, in the course of which Price got his opponent to the ground, and, while in that position, stabbed him with a knife. The unfortunate man died soon after, and his murderer escaped. A warrant was issued for the apprehension of the latter, but the police could never find any trace of him until last week, when a man, who formerly knew all the parties, happened to be on business at Fleur-de-lys. Here he saw the prisoner, and declared him to be no other than Price, who committed the murder described. Price still retained his name, and had been living in the place where he was found ever since the occurrence. He was apprehended and brought before the magistrates at Newport on the 13th, but remanded before any particulars were gone into. Communication was at once made with the Carmarthen police, and the depositions taken at the coroner's inquest on Williams obtained. The prisoner is a gray-headed man, and, not being called upon to say any thing, was silent while before the magistrates.

HOW CLERGYMEN GET LIVINGS IN ENGLAND.

The correspondent of the Times says: "An amusing story is told of the present Lord Chancellor, who, though himself unspoiled by his elevation, begins to suffer in popularity from the faults of others, and more especially from the ridiculous airs which certain members of his family give themselves. The keeper of the Great Seal has upward of three hundred benefices in his gift. Many of these are very small, but others are endowed with very respectable incomes. As may be supposed, each successive Chancellor is worried to death with applications, not one in twenty of which it would be possible for him to satisfy. For the first three months Lord Chelmsford's love of popularity, coupled with his genuine good nature, induced him to send considerate and oftentimes explanatory replies to the letters of clerical tormentors. But finding the Plague of Parsons did not abate, and that every son, nephew, and cousin in holy orders, of every acquaintance he ever had when he was in the navy or afterward at the bar, seemed resolved to establish intimate relations with him by means of correspondence, he made up his mind, in a moment of despair, that he would not confer a living on any representative of any friend of his youth; and that he would cause such, his inexorable determination in matters ecclesiastical, to be sternly communicated to all whom it might concern. Great was the dismay and grievous the reproaches caused by this l'ordre impitoyable; but the sprightly ambition of some cunning curates did not die with despair. While Lord Chelmsford was enjoying the autumnal breezes at Brighton, a young gentleman of fascinating voice, aspect, and address, who had felt himself called to the ministry, but whom no undiscerning bishop seemed likely to call to the receipt of pastoral custom, wended his listless way toward that great marine loitering-place of wealth, and rank, and fashion. He had not been at Brighton very long when he ascertained that it was the Chancellor's habit to frequent a church of which a friend of his was chaplain. Without communicating his discovery to his reverend acquaintance, he offered obligingly to take for him occasionally part of his duty. The unconscious chaplain, glad to be relieved for a Sunday or two, gratefully accepted the office, and his accomplished substitute got up an amazingly powerful discourse for the following Sunday. The great man came as usual, and was much impressed by the eloquence and earnestness of the young apostle. The day after, a mutual friend delighted him with the tidings that, having thrown himself in the Chancellor's way, he had been asked by his lordship the name of the youthful Boanerges, and that he had obtained leave to present him. Then, but not till then, the astute preacher let drop enough of his family history to inform Lord Chelmsford that his father and he had been messmates in the West Indies half a century ago. Believing that his new favorite had not infringed his admonitory rule, he assured him of the interest he took in his advancement, and promised to provide for him."

THE DEAD ALIVE.

An English country paper has the following: "The young girl whose singular restoration to life has been previously recorded is still living. Having had an opportunity of inquiring into this very remarkable affair, we are enabled to give the following particulars: The girl, whose name is Amelia Hinks, is twelve or thirteen years of age, and resided with her parents in Bridge Street, Nuneaton, and dwindling away under some unaccountable complaint, about three weeks ago she, as her friends imagined, died. The corpse was then removed to another room. The body was rigid and icy cold. It was washed and laid out with the usual deathly accompaniments (penny pieces being placed over the eyes), and the coffin was ordered. For more than forty-eight hours the supposed corpse lay beneath the winding-sheet, when it happened that her grandfather, a very aged man, came from Leamington to the neighborhood of Nuneaton. On going with a female relation to see the corpse, the old man removed one of the copper coins, and although the eye remained closed, he fancied he saw a movement beneath the lid. The female with him at first ridiculed the idea, but on looking more closely, she too observed a movement. The medical attendant was then apprised of the circumstance, and although he at first treated the matter as a delusion, the application of an instrument to the region of the heart soon convinced him that there was life within the apparent corpse. The body was then removed to a warmer room, and the existence of life soon became apparent. By degrees animation was restored, a loud sneeze placing the fact of her being a living subject beyond all doubt. When speech was restored, the girl described every thing that had taken place from the time of her supposed death. She knew who had closed her eyes and placed the coppers thereon. She also heard the order given for her coffin, and could describe the various remarks made over her as she lay in her death-clothes. At first on her restoration she refused all sustenance, and on some aliment being forced upon her, she became frightfully excited, and though in a state of extreme debility, it required great force to hold her. Since that period her conduct has been very strange. She entertains a wish to destroy her father and mother, and on one occasion, when they were asleep in the same room with herself, she arose from her bed in the dead of the night, went down stairs for a light, and having first destroyed, by burning, some needle-work, which she knew her mother 'set great store' upon, she set fire to the curtains, and then retired to her bed, from which it was thought impossible she could have moved. In fact so mysterious was the origin of the fire that her parents were at a loss to account for it, until the girl herself confessed having been the cause. She now lies in such a state that she can neither be called alive nor dead, the former state being only ascertained by a careful examination of her pulse. Were it not that there is no motive for deception, and the parents being creditable people, we should imagine that there was some ruse in this very extraordinary affair, which is causing considerable excitement in Nuneaton and the neighborhood."

FRANCE.

THE COST OF COURT LIFE.

A letter from Paris says: "The expense caused the Emperor by his visit to Compiègne is described to be prodigious; all the household is there, and the household is vast in number, and dear to keep; the hunting establishment is there, and it exceeds in number and magnificence, and consequently in cost, that which Charles X. used to maintain—and yet dearly did that royal Bourbon love hunting, and right royal was his venerie; guests of high degree are there, and have troops of lackeys with them; and last, but not least, the entire companies of various Paris theatres are taken down twice or thrice a week to amuse the distinguished party; and what in pay, and presents, and traveling and 'incidental expenses,' those companies absorb a good deal. Nor is it only the Emperor's purse that bleeds; the guests themselves have to buy uniforms of green and gold for the hunts, and the ladies are required to appear in two new dresses a day."

THE EMPRESS IN FAVOR OF ROMANTIC MARRIAGES.

The young officer of the Cent Gardes, who, rallied by his comrades for his love of a young girl without fortune, and who, considering her reputation compromised by their fool-born jesting, had boldly resolved to marry her, has been reinstated in his commission, which he was forced to resign in order to fulfill his intention. The Empress has most generously insisted on this act of justice, and, moreover, has appointed the young lady to an official situation about the person of the Prince Imperial.

LAMARTINE BEGGING IN PUBLIC.

A meeting of the committee of the Lamartine subscription was held on the 15th at the Hôtel du Louvre. M. de Lamartine, in an impassioned speech, the delivery of which lasted not less than two hours, explained the state of his private affairs, and justified himself from the charges of prodigality which he said had been calumniously brought against him. The amount of his debts had, he said, been exaggerated; it was only 2,200,000 francs, and he had this year paid off 900,000 francs. The chairman, M. Vavin, put the question to the meeting whether the Lamartine subscription should be abandoned or continued, and it was unanimously resolved that it should be continued, and a new appeal made to the country.

DI VERNONISM IN FRANCE.

The Court continues its hunting operations in the forests of Compiègne, but these last few days have been such dampers to the chase, in the way of rain, mud, and mist, that the festivities are likely to be cut short. The prowess of Imperial Eugénie has spread a contagion of Diana Vernonism among the ladies of France. All the autumn not only archery and fencing had its fair adepts, but rowing-matches on the Seine, between St. Cloud and St. Germains, were feminine amusements; and Mademoiselle Alphonsine C—— feathered an oar or a scull against all comers. It is true that Madame Lefay is for some years a prominent winner on the turf; and as to game licenses, lady fowlers have paid the tax at Strasburg, Melun, Lille, Tours, and Poictiers. The last town had already its historic Diana.

A NEW CURE FOR SEA-SICKNESS.

The Herald correspondent writes: "A. M. Jobard has published a book on sea-sickness which possesses some novelty. He states that sea-sickness is caused by the mechanical action of the bowels, which are made to vibrate by the heaving and pitching of the vessel and to strike against the diaphragm. The liver and gall-bladder, thus exposed to repeated action and percussion, emit a larger quantity of bile than usual, and retching is the natural consequence. M. Jobard, therefore, simply proposes to tie down the intestines, so as to prevent the jolting, which may be effectually done by two belts, one passing under the thorax and the other between the legs."

A SINGULAR CASE OF MADNESS.

The Paris correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune says: "One of the most brilliant talkers in Paris has been carried to the mad-house! I allude to M. Malitourne. Dr. Veron, in his memoirs, speaks of him in these words: 'M. Malitourne is, above all, a fascinating talker; he divines the impressions of those who listen to him, their momentary thoughts, and he gives life to these impressions and thoughts by just and piquant words. He said of M. de Chateaubriand; "He is the republican the most devoted to the monarchy we have in France."' He used to say, during the Restoration, 'I shall cease to fear a new revolution the moment our legitimate princes begin to believe themselves chez nous, and cease to believe themselves chez eux.' I asked M. Malitourne to recall some of the witty remarks he so often makes in conversation; he replied, 'It is with my esprit as it is with my money—I have never been able to bring myself to write down my expenses.' M. Malitourne has frequently received prizes from the French Academy, he was an able contributor to the Revue des Deux Mondes, and he has frequently been employed by the Government. He lived entirely by his pen, and, as he spent little money (he dined every day with Dr. Veron and had a free ticket to all of the theatres), he did not fatigue himself by labor. He was writing a work—'Des Caracteres de ce Siecle'—when he read a suit for libel brought against a vulgar fellow who sold slanders for biography. He took it into his head that his book would be regarded as a slander, and he be tried as a libeler. He became alarmed and threw his book into the fire. In a few days it became evident he was crazy, and he was carried to Bicetre. He has been greatly relieved by his stay there; his mind is as calm if not as lucid as formerly; he is as good humored and smiling as ever. His madness lies in thinking himself naked. When his friends go to see him, he instantly recognizes them, but before he will say a word to them, he makes them give him their coat or cloak to hide his nakedness. Then he talks with his wonted grace and brilliancy, and when his friends get up to go, he returns the borrowed garment, saying: 'It is right you should be covered when you go into the street.' And he accompanies them to the door, adding, as he shakes hands, 'I can't go any farther; you know the reason why!' and he returns to his chamber smiling and blushing. What a painful affliction! Death is ten thousand times preferable to it! Let me add, to the honor of Dr. Veron, that he pays M. Malitourne's board at Bicetre, although the Minister of the Interior insisted that the Government should pay it."

SWITZERLAND.

MORE TRAVELERS LOST IN THE SNOW.

Excessive cold has for some days past prevailed in Switzerland, and on the 7th it caused a loss of life. Eight villagers of Evolène were returning from the fair of Aosto by the glacier of Aola, when three of them walked on in advance. After a while the five found the three lying on the snow, and unable to proceed; they had become benumbed and had sunk to the earth. The five tried all they could to make them rise, and even beat them with sticks, but in vain. Fearing at length that they themselves would be overcome with cold, four of them went away; but the fifth, named Favre, who was an intimate friend of one of the three, named Beybrison, took him on his shoulders, and with immense difficulty carried him a distance of two leagues, when his own hands, feet, and nose having become frost-bitten, he was obliged, in spite of the other's earnest entreaties, to abandon him to his fate. On hearing of what had happened, twenty-two young men of the village set out to search for the three men. They easily found Beybrison, but he was quite dead. The bodies of the other two having become buried in the snow could not be discovered.

ITALY.

ARE THE FRENCH TO REMAIN AT ROME?

The Times correspondent, writing from Rome, under date November 10, says: "The question of the French occupation stands, according to the best information I have as yet been able to obtain, pretty much as follows. The Papal Government, that is to say, the Pope and Cardinal Antonelli, or perhaps I should say Cardinal Antonelli and the Pope, would like to get rid of their allies. They are of opinion that they could get on very well without French bayonets, and keep the peace with their own resources. In this belief it is thought they are mistaken. Persons well able to form a just appreciation of the situation, believe that disturbances would quickly follow the withdrawal of the French troops. Of these there are now about 5000 in the Papal States, including, of course, those in this city. Were they to leave, the Swiss (of whom there are hardly 4000) would be all the Government could depend upon, and they would not suffice. As to the Roman troops, I am positively assured that no reliance could be placed upon them, and that they would be much more likely to join in a revolution than to cooperate in its suppression. The Roman army numbers, I believe, about 10,000. All these points considered, it is pretty evident that the French can not yet be dispensed with, without danger to the existing order of things."

ATTEMPT TO POISON MADAME RISTORI.

A letter from Parma states that a diabolical attempt has been made there to murder Madame Ristori by administering to her some real poison in a cup from which she was to drink on the stage. Of course the Austrian Government is charged with the crime.

WHAT POWERS IS DOING.

A Florence correspondent of the Boston Courier says: "Through the kindness of Mr. Powers, an opportunity was afforded me of seeing his bronze statue of Webster, at the foundery here, the day before it was prepared for shipment. It is a noble figure, of more than life size, representing Webster as standing erect, his left hand resting on a bundle of fasces, while his right hand holds across his breast a roll of manuscript. The costume is modern throughout, and the dress-coat is buttoned over the chest. I was greatly disappointed in the head of the statue; it appeared to me a failure as to form, likeness, and intellectual expression. The statue was cast in one piece; the bronze is quite different in color from that of the Munich foundery, being dull and muddy-looking. Mr. Powers has just completed, at his studio, a copy of the Fisher Boy, for the Hon. Hamilton Fish, and is now engaged on a bust of Mrs. Wade Hampton, whose brother, the Hon. John S. Preston, is now residing in Florence."

A PRIEST SENTENCED TO PRISON FOR DENOUNCING HOOPS.

A curé of Issoverdi, near Genoa, taking umbrage at the gay dresses worn by some of his fair parishioners, launched out in the pulpit into a furious denunciation of vanity; but, instead of questioning the taste of the parties, he questioned their virtue. Great indignation was felt by the women at a suggestion conveyed in any thing but diplomatic terms, and an action was brought forthwith against the curé. The latter pleaded in vain that he had been carried away by the spirit of eloquence; in fact, that he had made the suggestion in a Pickwickian sense; he has been condemned to five days' imprisonment and ten francs fine.

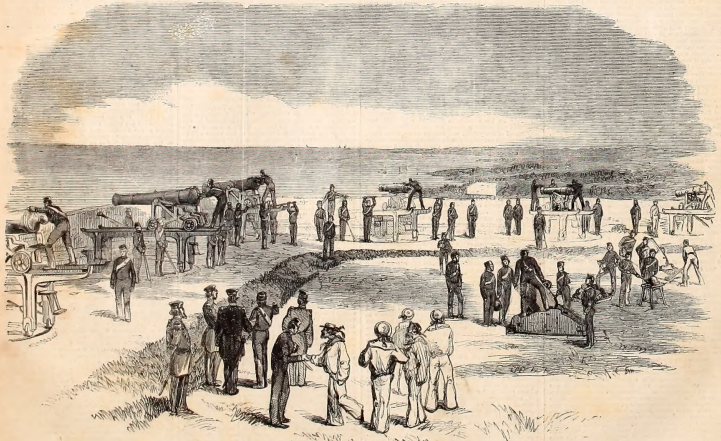
TURKEY.

WHAT IT COSTS TO RETRENCH THE SULTAN'S EXPENSES.

The Constantinople correspondent of the Daily News, after detailing an affair which shows the corruption still prevailing in the administrative department, says: "To this, however, I may add mention of one other matter of fact which I do not remember to have spoken of yet, but which is in itself a whole volume of expository comment on the economy-farce to which Riza Pacha is playing the part of stage-manager. What do your readers suppose are the proper official emoluments of this high-priest of the retrenchment mysteries himself? 115,000 piastres a month as Seraskier, 115,000 as Grand Master of the Artillery, 80,000 as Mushir of the Palace, and 60,000 of a life-pension, together with 200,000 piastres' worth of rations—or a yearly total of 6,840,000 piastres, at the present rate of exchange about £460,000 sterling! Fabulous as these figures read, they truly represent the aggregate of the various salaries pocketed by this economic pluralist, who thus swallows up in his own person nearly one-sixteenth part of the whole nominal income of the state! The fact carries with it its own comment, and offers a more powerful exposition of the sincerity of the Government in its present pretense of retrenchment than a whole column of argument could supply."

CHRISTIAN PROGRESS AND TURKISH INTOLERANCE.

The correspondent of the Boston Traveller writes: "I saw a scene, the other day, which certainly would have given occasion to an uprising here, if any thing could. The foundation-stone of an English church was publicly laid by Lord Stratford, in the very midst of a Turkish quarter in Pera. If the distinct object of the founders had been to do the greatest possible violence to the most sacred feelings of the Turks, it really seemed to me that they could not have chosen a more appropriate site for this church. It is completely and closely surrounded by Turkish dwelling-houses, and on one side stands a mosque, whose minaret brushes against the temporary wooden fence that has been erected around the church lot. The other day, when prayers were offered, hymns sung, and addresses delivered, in the midst of a large company of Englishmen, on that very spot groups of Turkish women were gathered around, watching with the most intense interest and anxiety every part of the ceremony. In the midst of one of the groups was a dervish, who was as intently gazing upon the scene as the rest, and seemed to say the glory of Islamism is departed. While the proceedings were going forward it came to be one of the hours for prayer, and the Imaum went up on to the top of the minaret to give notice to the neighborhood, according to invariable custom. But his issuing from the hole in the minaret upon the gallery was observed by some of the Embassador's Kavases (guards of honor) below, who, putting their fingers to their mouths, beckoned to him to be still, and he remained a silent though sad spectator of the scene, leaning over the balustrade of the minaret for a full hour! The women below said to one another, in a suppressed tone, 'See how our poor Imaum weeps!' A few years ago such a thing could not be seen in Turkey; but now things have greatly changed; and I think you will agree with me in saying that the minds of the Turkish populace here can not be in a very inflammable state, or they would not have allowed so veritable an occasion for rising to pass unimproved."



THE PARAGUAY EXPEDITION.

THE "SABINE" AT ANCHOR IN GRASSY BAY, BERMUDA.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY OUR ARTIST CORRESPONDENT.]

THE PARAGUAY EXPEDITION—THE "SABINE" AT BERMUDA.

THE public are generally aware that the United States frigate Sabine, the flagship of Commodore Shubrick, having been overtaken by a "cyclone" or hurricane on her way to the La Plata in the last week of October, was obliged to put into Bermuda for repairs. Our attentive correspondent has sent us from thence a couple of photographs—of the good ship at her anchorage, and of the reception of the United States visitors on shore. She anchored at Grassy Bay opposite the Royal Navy Yard, and was immediately visited by the British officers on the station, and every facility and assistance were offered for the purpose of effecting her repairs. The correspondent of the Herald writing from Bermuda thus describes the kind reception granted to our countrymen by the islanders:

"The Governor seems to have made it a point to treat our Admiral with the most distinguished consideration, as well as the most cordial hospitality. Captain Hutton, the senior naval officer on the station, has cheerfully afforded every assistance in repairing the injuries sustained by the vessel, and certainly has most materially aided by his own efforts the departure of the Sabine. The dock-yard, with its excellent mechanics, was placed completely at our command; and, although our own men sufficed in most instances, when supplied with proper means, the kindness was no less appreciated. The personal attentions of that officer deserve every acknowledgment. For the officers of the Twenty-sixth Cameronians we can but always entertain a grateful sense of the elegant entertainment with which we were honored at their hands. It was then, probably, for the first time, that the garrison of Bermuda resounded with a toast to the President of the United States and the stirring music of 'Hail Columbia.' It is a matter of regret, while every personal courtesy has been extended to the officers of the Sabine that could evince respect to the nation or add to our own obligations, that we should be unable to make any return. The state of the vessel and the continual repairs she has been undergoing would not permit of that pleasure."

THE MAILS CROSSING A TORRENT IN THE RAINY SEASON IN INDIA.

INDIAN LETTER-CARRIERS.

THE accompanying illustrations will enable the public of the United States to judge of the dangers and difficulties which beset the transmission of the mails in India. The first depicts the slinging of letter-bags across a swollen stream in India during the rainy season. The dawk-runner, or mail-carriers can overcome every ordinary obstacle, such as heat, rain, rock, and jungle; but a swollen torrent stops them. When, therefore, the rains swell the mountain streams so as to render them unfordable, the people of the vicinity take time by the forelock and sling a rope across them. By an ingenious handling of the end of the rope the bags are got across, and a fresh runner starts off with them at once.

The other engraving represents the catamaran postman, who comes out on his log through the surf to board ships on their arrival in India. These famous boatmen have been thus described:

"As ships approach the coast passengers' eyes are strained in the direction of the land, not yet in sight. The interest is getting more intense every minute, when a small, dark object is descried among the distant waves. Now it dips, now rises, now battles with the waves, and now it disappears entirely beneath a huge roller, only, however, to reappear on this side. Soon it becomes evident that the novel object is a specimen of the natives of the land ahead. He is kneeling on a small float, or solid piece of wood, shaped something like a canoe, but not hollowed, possessing just sufficient buoyancy to keep the occupant from sinking. The rapidity with which the voyage is going now becomes apparent, for the strange boatman has shot past, well-nigh, 'Ope, ope, ope!' with all his might; and long before the many curious eyes directed toward him have had any chance of gratifying their curiosity he is out far away over the stern, making vigorous efforts with his paddle to keep up sufficient way to enable him to grasp the rope which the sailors have thrown to him in compliance with his strangely-sounding request. The interest increases as you watch with straining eyes his chances of gaining what appears to be deliverance from certain peril. While you are thus engaged another rope has been thrown with a more dexterous hand, and this he has clutched and made fast to his tiny bark; in another instant the dark stranger has 'shinned' up the side, six the chains, on to the deck, and 'Catamaran Jack' (as the sailors familiarly term him), with his conical cap of basket-work, his only attire, saving scanty drawers of calico, stands confessed; the briny elements rose down his body in small streams, forming little pools on the deck where he is standing, and the passengers gaze at him with eager curiosity. He is not, however, abashed at this; but forthwith proceeds to smile the string of his cap, from the warmth lining of which he produces a letter wrapped in a small piece of calico. The letter he hands to the captain, and the calico is replaced in his helmet for future service.

"These adventurous postmen paddle forth in all weathers, and when the sea is very rough they are frequently washed off their seats. Being excellent swimmers, however, they think nothing of such accidents, but regain their catamarans with astonishing activity. With all his activity, however, Jack's calling is a dangerous one. Sharks swarm on the Coromandel coast, and Jack has frequently to do battle with them. In these encounters the paddle is the means of defense, and is used with a desperation equal to the emergency. Although for the most part victorious, many of these boatmen fall victims to the voracity of the shark—the most deadly enemy to swimmers in tropical seas."

LINA FERNIE.

CHAPTER I.

"I tell you, John, you're just a fool!" exclaimed Widow Harland, regarding her son with pettish impatience and astonishment.

John looked very headstrong, and willful, and desperately in earnest about the subject under discussion. "It is always a hard word with you, mother," said he, deprecatingly. "What can you have against Lina?"

"Have against her! She's the most conceited, selfish, uppish, wasteful wench in all Brigham!" was the uncompromising reply. "Marry her! She'll break your heart in a twelvemonth! She'd break any honest man's heart with her idleness and love of finery."

"She has an uncommon pretty face, mother; and isn't it women's ways to like to set it off a bit?" pleaded John. "You never saw any harm in her until I took on with her."

"It is not for me to lightlie a neighbor's daughter when she is nought to me; but when you talk of bringing in a lass like Lina Fernie, and setting her up over your old mother's head, then it's time to speak, I think. I hoped you would have acted more sensible when it came to seeking a wife, John. A fine young man like you, with a well-plenished house to bring her to, and work the year in an' the year out. Why, you might have the pick of the parish!"

"And that's what Lina is: she's the pick of the parish. Show me her match any where!"

"I say nought about prettiness; for red and white, and blue eyes like a wax doll's, Lina would be hard to beat; but they won't bake your bread, or guide your house, John, mind that! What can she do?—there's the question."

"Why, I suppose, mother, that, like other girls, she can learn. She's only young."

"I don't like her bringing-up. I don't like the family, John. They have never borne very good characters, either at home or abroad."

"And is poor Lina to be blamed for that?"

"Have you spoken to her yet, John?"

"No. I thought I must speak to you first."

"Well, then, I've said my say. If it had been Mary Jenner, or Libbie Frost, I would have been glad to make way for either of them; but it goes sorely against the grain with me to give place to Lina Fernie."

"Mary Jenner's older than me, mother; and Libbie Frost's downright ugly."

"I don't mind of hearing you say so till Lina came home from her aunt's in London."

"Libbie's well enough for some things, but I could not fancy to marry her if there was not another woman in the world."

Mrs. Harland sighed deeply, and plied her knitting-pins fast; John continued to hover about her, scarcely satisfied to act against her counsel, yet fully bent on getting Lina Fernie for his wife.

"I wasn't a beauty, John, as well you may see," said the mother, with a wistful smile; "yet your father fancied me, and I don't think he ever regretted his choice. I was a good, useful article, he used to say."

"You're a deal better like than Libbie Frost now; and, mother, there'd be you to put Lina in the way of things, you know," he insinuated.

"She's not one that will take kindly to teaching; but I wish you would not talk to me about her any more. If your heart's set on her, I know you over well to expect to see you change it."

John acknowledged that his heart was set on Lina, and that a miserable man he would be that day he thought she looked coldly on him; and finding his mother really indisposed to indulge him with any further conversation on the subject, he strolled down the neat little garden into the village street, and turned naturally toward Lina's cottage.

Lina was standing on her door-step, having a gossip with a neighbor. She haunted the door-step very much, and never scrupled to hold any body in talk, man, woman, or child, young or old, rich or poor, friend or stranger, who passed by that way. She had not an atom of shyness. Indeed, John's mother was much more correct in her estimate of the village belle than was John himself. Lina was very pretty, very; nobody could gainsay that. Her complexion was of creamy fairness, with a brilliant but delicate bloom; her hair was bright golden, her figure was short, but plump. Lina knew she was a beauty, and liked other people to know it, too. She had no objection to the assiduities of the handsome young mason. Indeed, the longer her train of admirers the better Lina liked it; so when she saw him coming toward the cottage she bridled her white neck, and looked as captivatingly unconscious of him as ever she could—a needless wile, for poor John was already prostrated by the power of her charms, and perfectly incapable of a single reasonable reflection with regard to her.

As he approached, Meggie Sanders, the other gossip, drew off, and Lina invited John into the house. He accepted the courtesy gratefully; for there was only the deaf old grandmother sitting by the fire, and she would take no heed to their conversation. John had not at any time a skillful tongue at commonplace chat, and his present absorbing feelings for Lina made him even less fluent than usual—a matter of which the girl was clearly sensible; but, by-and-by, he got one of Lina's nice little hands in his hard brown ones, and after remarking that it was as white as a lady's, he said, with a glowing blush on his honest face,

"Lina, I want you to give it to me?"

"Give you my hand, John! Why what in the world could you do with it?" asked she, feigning not to understand him.

"I mean, Lina, will you be my wife? Do you like me well enough?"

"Why, John, I never so much as thought about you!"

"But will you try to think about me? Oh, Lina, I think of you night and day, and get no peace for thinking of you!"

Lina laughed merrily, and tried to pull away her hand; but John held it fast all the same, and would not let it go until she answered him.

"I don't want to be married, John," said she, half pettishly; "and besides, I know your mother is cross, and does not like me. She thinks that fright Libbie Frost would suit you better."

"But I don't think so, Lina; and so, what does it matter? You would soon get round my mother, for she is real good. She scarcely knows you."

"Yes, she does; and she always looks at me as if she were jealous about you—and I'm sure she needn't be."

"Don't say that, Lina, don't. I'd rather she was ever so jealous than that you should not care for me. Do you care for me, Lina, darling—"

"Just a little bit; about as much as that," and the rural coquette measured off the first joint of her little finger as the amount of her affection for the ardent young mason.

"It's a beginning, Lina. It will be the whole hand soon;" and John looked not dissatisfied.

"Don't be over sure, John. Didn't I tell you I'd no thoughts of marrying yet? Oh, it's dull, ever so dull, to get married when one's young!" and the lively maiden lifted up her hands in horrified deprecation of such a weariful fate. John's countenance fell.

"But not if you liked me, Lina?" insinuated he, imprisoning the little hand again. "Don't be unkind."

"I don't like you much, John, you know—you are over old for me; I do believe you're thirty, at least?"

"Nay, Lina, I'm not so old as that, neither. I'm only eight-and-twenty," replied John, earnestly.

"And I'm eighteen—there's ten years between us. No, no, John; you're too old, you're too old!" and Mistress Lina shook her head, and looked seriously bewildering out of her blue eyes.

"I always knew you were a famous scholar, Lina, but I did not think you'd learnt ciphering, either;" said John, with feigned surprise. "A clever little wife like you would be the making of me—you would, indeed. Why, if I ever get to be a master builder, you could help me with the books."

"I hate books, and I hate summing worse than any thing!" retorted the perverse damsel, pouting.

John looked down at her half grieved and half admiring. She looked prettier than ever when she was rebellious. "Now, Lina, that's just to plague me," said he; "as if I were not bad enough without. Just give me one smile before I go—here's your father coming."

"La, John, how silly you are! Well, I'm going to Bartinglas feast on Thursday, and you may go with me if you like—does that please you?" John showed by his face that it did, and then, as Lina's father reeled round the hedge, he departed; for old Fernie was quarrelsome in his cups with friend and foe, but especially with a friend.

CHAPTER II.

To Bartinglas feast together went John and Lina, it being generally understood now by the friends and relatives of both parties that they were keeping company. But if John anticipated that he should keep Lina to himself all the day of the feast he was woefully mistaken. The admiration of one was by no means sufficient to satisfy her craving, and she gadded about from place to place in search of other acquaintance, letting John see that he was far from necessary to her. But his greatest grievance was, that when it was decent time to go home, Lina announced her determination to stay for a dance that was to take place in the long room of the public house. John was not a frequenter of public houses, and the idea that Lina should wish to enter such a place and join in such revelry as these rustic dances are, equally mortified and astonished him. He remonstrated and she pouted; she said he might go home and she would return with her cousins; but to this he would not agree, and the end was that Lina capered through half a dozen country-dances with half a dozen fresh partners, while John propped his back sulkily against the white-washed wall, and looked on disgusted. If he had broken with her that night, as she tried her utmost to make him do, it would have been all the better for him; but John was infatuated; and though it hurt him to see his mother's grieved and angry face when he told her the reason of his late return from the feast, still he would not listen to a single word said in disparagement of Lina, and he would have bitten out his tongue rather than utter one.

From that evening at Bartinglas poor John never had a happy hour again, never a day's peace or ease of mind. Though Lina soon after pledged him her word that she would marry him in the fall of the year, she could not resist the often recurring temptation to exercise her attractions on other young men; and as John was naturally of a sudden and violent, or rather jealous, temper, her conduct tried him severely. In vain he expostulated, in vain he reasoned, in vain he pleaded; Lina would only pout her dissatisfaction at his lectures, and tell him if he did not like her he was free to leave her; but poor John felt to his sorrow that he was less free than ever. His mortification and disappointment had a wretched effect on his temper; he became morose and irritable, even to his mother, and with Lina herself high words became quite common—rather, indeed, the rule than the exception when they met.

Mrs. Harland, when she knew that her son and Lina were really promised to each other, made a duty of the necessity, and tried to know her intended daughter-in-law better; but Lina always showed her a repulsive, unfriendly face, and, finally, the widow, losing all patience, gave up the vain attempt, and left her to her own devices. To one thing, however, she made up her mind, and that was, that she would not continue to live in the cottage with her son when he brought home Lina as his wife, and when the time for the wedding drew near she began to make preparations for retiring elsewhere. Lina made no secret of how glad this arrangement made her, for she was afraid of Mrs. Harland's serious integrity; but John regretted his mother's resolution for many and good reasons.

CHAPTER III.

It wanted but three weeks of the day fixed for the marriage, when John, going one evening rather later than usual to the Fernies' cottage, found seated there in the most friendly way, conversing with Lina, a smart young clerk out for a holiday, whom Lina told her lover she had known at her aunt's in London. The clerk was a good-looking, conceited young sprig, who evidently had a comfortable assurance of his own personal attractions. He called Lina, Linny, and made a hundred allusions to past events and amusements, while John sat by chafing and galled at his impertinent familiarity, which Lina had not any notion of checking. To do the young city clerk justice, he had no idea whatever that the ponderous young mason, who was so slow of speech and heavy of step, could be a wooer of Linny, whom he thought of seriously for himself; and he gave him several broad hints that his room would be more acceptable than his company. But John staid perseveringly on, until Lina contrived him an errand to the top of the village, and sent him away, whether he would or no.

"Who is that fiery-faced clown, Linny? He lords it over you finely!" lisped the genteel clerk.

Lina colored and stammered. She was ashamed to acknowledge John before this young spark; who despised a far better man than himself.

"Oh! he is a mason. He works with my father," said she.

There was a fine bush of monthly roses trailing over the cottage walls, from which Lina always culled a few to embellish her work-table. It happened that some had been newly-gathered that afternoon, and she had taken one out of the cup and was playing with it while John was in the cottage. When John came back from the errand on which she had dispatched him the rose had changed its place from her fingers to the city clerk's button-hole—a transference which caught his jealous eye in a moment. He gave her a glance, to which she replied with one of coquettish defiance; and as the young stranger presently went away and left them together, he began to be very angry.

"I tell you what, John Harland," retorted she, passionately, "if you had not got my word I'd never marry you. I like Tom Freeling's little finger better than your whole body!" John's eyes blazed, and he dashed away from the cottage in a fury. The heartless girl had quite warped his honest, manly nature. He scarcely knew what he did for the next hour or two. It was late when he arrived home, and his mother was waiting up for him. It had begun to rain, and a distant rumble of thunder echoed in the sky. Mrs. Harland got up from her chair to bolt the door when he came in; but he impatiently forbade her, as he was going out again very early in the morning. She asked where he was going to; but as he seemed not to hear, and did not reply to her question, she said further: "Need I sit up, Johnny, I'm tired with washing to-day?" He seemed startled by her weary tone, and turned round to kiss her. This touch of now unusual tenderness quite broke down the old mother's reserve. "Oh! John, John! you've not been like yourself lately; what ails you? what's amiss?" and she hung about him affectionately. He put her quietly aside, after a minute or two, and bade her go to bed.

Long before daylight John was ready. He took down a gun that hung over the chimney, deliberately cleaned it, loaded it, and concealing it partially under his coat, he left the house stealthily, and set off on the high-road to Bartinglas. His countenance was wicked and deadly under the cloud of night. But no one met him; no one saw him to suspect on what evil errand he was bound. He had heard the young clerk say to Lina, out in the garden, before they parted: "Early to-morrow morning I'm going over to Bartinglas. Meet me there at noon, Linny, and we'll have a walk in the wood without that spying fiery-faced clown to watch us!" "Hush, he'll hear!" was Lina's response; and, on the instant, there came a devilish thought into John's head. "I'll spoil your meeting. I'll be beforehand with you, my fine gentleman—you shall not ridicule me to Lina again!"

As he walked, the rain continued to stream down in torrents. When he came to a little thick copse by the road-side, he hid himself among the trees. There was partial shelter for him overhead, but he stood in the tall wet reeds and grass. No matter: the chill did not cool his hot blood, nor quench the fire of jealous rage that was consuming him, and he waited there until the morning began to break through the dense watery clouds. Then he established himself under a careful covert, where he could see the road from Brigham, but would be himself unseen by any one approaching from that direction. The rain had ceased, but a thick vapor rose from the fields and dense vegetation about him. His watch was prolonged; he began to feel pains in his limbs and head, and giddiness. He found that he could scarcely steady his hands to raise the gun; not from any failure in his purpose, but from sheer physical inability. At last he heard the trot of a pony on the road, and the clear whistle of the young clerk. With a mad haste he tried to raise the gun. But his arm failed him. It was suddenly struck with such weakness that he could not lift the weapon above his own breast; and in that moment his deadly chance was lost. He sprang out into the road, with the intention of dragging the stranger from his horse and beating him to death; but his foot slipped on the mud of the bank, and he fell prostrated on his face. The clerk, hearing the noise, turned, rode back, and recognized the mason whom he had seen at Lina's cottage.

"Eh! what, poaching!" he cried, as John reared his indignant head and stumbled upon his feet; "take my warning, Giles, if that's your name, and leave the game to them it belongs to. There's only one step, and that a short one, as I've heard say, between poaching and sheep-stealing." And with that he trotted off, whistling his tune, and leaving John more wroth than before. He was half mad as he staggered home and restored the gun to its place over the chimney. His mother was just stirring. He had sense enough left to crawl into his chamber so stealthily that she should not suspect he had been absent all night. But for any rest he could get, he might have had his body stretched upon the rack and the tooth of an active devil gnawing at his heart.

CHAPTER IV.

It was full three months before John Harland set foot over the threshold again; and when he did so at last, it was as a gaunt spectre, crippled and deformed by rheumatism in almost every limb. Toward the close of a sunshiny September afternoon, when the village was empty, every available hand being engaged in the harvest-field, he said to his mother, who was sitting with her knitting in the open door-way,

"Mother, how long is it since Lina Fernie came to see after me? I haven't heard her voice for days—weeks, I think."

"It is weeks, John. Be advised by me, and give up thinking about her," was the pleading reply.

"It is all very easy to say give up thinking about her; but it is none so easy to do," said John, bitterly. "I mean to hear my fate from her own lips; and if you'll reach me down my plaid I'll go and see her now—she never goes to the harvest."

"Wait a bit longer, John; wait a bit longer—you can't bear any thing yet."

"And you think she'll have nothing more to say to me?" asked the young man, hoarsely.

"Oh, Johnny, lad! don't look so wretched, she's never worth it. She's never worth thy good heart!"

A miserable contortion passed over his features as his mother uttered the last words. No one but himself knew what evil intentions had been bred in that good heart, which a merciful Providence had frustrated. He rose with a stick and crutch and hobbled to the door. Oh, what a wreck he was! But not such a wreck as he might have been if God had left him his strength unparalyzed on that terrible night when he went out intent on shedding blood. His mother brought his plaid and wrapped it all round him, and then kissed his sallow, sickly face fervently.

"Remember, Johnny, thee has me always, me that loved thee first, and will always love thee best!" she cried, as she let him go.

"Something tells me I'll have need to remember it, mother," he replied; "but I can't bear this torture of waiting any longer, and I'll know the worst at once."

She watched him down the village street, and saw him disappear within Fernie's cottage; not five minutes elapsed before he came out again. It was sad—oh, it was more than sad—to see the painful haste with which he toiled up the sunny, dusty street. His mother ran to meet him, and helped him in doors, not thinking of questioning him, so terrified was she at the expression of rage and agony that convulsed his features. He dropped upon the settle with a groan, and hid his face. After a moment he burst into a womanish passion of tears, which shook his crippled form vehemently. The mother watched him, and knew what it meant. The whole hope, dream, joy of his life was gone from him—forever gone.

It was many weeks before John brought himself to speak of his brief interview with Lina; he then told his mother what had passed.

"Lina," said he, "was sitting by the window, and she gave a scream when she saw me. 'Eh, John, but what a miserable lamester you are!' and laughed. I suppose there was something startling in my changed looks. I asked her if she meant to keep her word by me; and her answer was, 'Nay, John, I never loved you much, and you must be out of your head to think I shall marry you now!' And so I left her, laughing at my hobbling walk. That's Lina!"

CHAPTER V.

John Harland is a gray-headed old man now—harsh, bitter, unlovely: tainted through and through with the poison of his disappointment. A kind word, a kind deed, are not altogether strange to him, perhaps; but he hides them, as something of which he is ashamed. He says all the world is selfish, and crafty, and cruel.

As for Lina, beautiful, vain, unfeeling, she has been in her grave these many, many years: though where she lies, or how she died, we can not tell. No one wept for her, nor felt for her, but him whom she despised. John knows what became of her. His charity found her in her despair, and gave her a grave; but how, or when, or where, he never said; and none of those left in Brigham who knew her care to ask. She was not much beloved.

OLD CUSTOMS.

SIR JOSIAH CUTLER, a wise and great man in his generation, sending out instructions from the East India Company, in the reign of King Charles the Second, imperiously told Mr. Yarx that he expected his orders were to be his rules, and not the laws of England; which were a heap of nonsense compiled by a few ignorant country gentlemen who hardly knew how to make laws for the government of their own families, much less for the regulating of companies and foreign commerce.

Other persons, not so learned or so wise as Sir Josiah, were of the same opinion for the same reasons. The farmers of Sussex, for instance, found it simply impossible to live unless they were allowed to export the wool of the sheep that fed upon their great downs; and even the most inspected of the Sussex hangers-on, with a very peculiar kind of smuggling, which consisted in getting prohibited goods ashore in Sussex, by following trade, as it was called, became regularly organized in defiance of the law, and was carried on to a vast extent in from fourteen to sixteen of the Sussex coast. The smugglers trusted the farmers, and the farmers trusted the smugglers. A kind of code of honor, or local morals, was established among them, and was rarely infringed on. In such a state of things, the discretion of a foolish legislature—the revenue-officer who interfered with their business became a nuisance to the people's eyes, the well-to-do; while the free-trader, as he was then generally called, was considered the friend of all. The poor, who lived by land-trade, feelings taken rest in these parts a century and more ago. Had there been existed a Sussex free-trader, a clergyman, or a gentleman, who had not actively sympathized with the unlawful trade.

A curious and interesting revival of this degree in which this spirit had spread and corrupted the minds of the people, is to be found in the history of the murder of Daniel Chater and William Galley, which occurred in the neighborhood, in the year that twenty-five hundred and fifty-eight years, which we will now relate, with strict adherence to the facts, as sworn to at the trials of the murderers.

In September of that year one John Dymond, a shepherd, and, no doubt, an agent for others, agreed with a number of smuggling men, over from the Sussex coast to the island of Guernsey to smuggle a large quantity of tea. The tea was purchased, their price, and proceeded, like business-men, to execute their commission; but unusual ill-luck befell them. On the very night that they left with a revenue-cutter, which gave chase. They were forced to throw several cases and packages overboard and the revenue-officers, though they captured no men—and were not likely to capture any men while the farm-houses and the village-alehouses are beyond in the country—carried the vessel into the port of Poole, in Dorsetshire, and lodged its cargo in the custom-house there.

Such an interference with the trade of the neighborhood fell upon it like an insane cannon-ball excitement. The ladies' lace, the landed gentleman's claret, might be cut off next; no one was sure that of his tenants might be wanting; for, though at every burial the deceased was declared on oath to be buried in woolen dead-clothes, the farmers could still find no sufficient demand for their fleece without sending it abroad. The whole country, for a circle, ought to be done; and although the respectable portion of the population were disinclined to be the first to move, the free-traders of the county might safely reckon upon public sympathy in any reasonable attempt to administer a lesson to the obnoxious enemy.

Toward the end of the month a body of smugglers, to the amount of sixty-and-odd men, held a night meeting by torch-light in a solitary part of Charlton Down. All were well provided with fire-arms, and Dymond, the nominal proprietor of the seized cargo, was there. At this meeting a plan was arranged, by which the goods should be taken between the sixth and seventh of the next month, they proceed to act. They appear to have had little fear of any thing except the company of soldiers; who, being but lately posted in the neighborhood, might be supposed to be wanting in sympathy with the general feeling of the inhabitants. To meet this difficulty, portions of the gang were stationed at different places on the road to meet them; and, about thirty of the number, well armed, marched gayly into the town of Poole, and openly surrounded the revenue-officers, and broke into the custom-house. Here, to their great joy, they found the whole of their cargo of tea—and that, to the fourteen hundred weight—a quantity in those days of very large value. This, in the midst of a large town and by a bright moon, they loaded on packhorses, and then rode leisurely away through the streets and along the highroad. They took only boldly afterward and the men, or guess their names, to say what was the quantity of the seized portion of the tea, or discover any one, far or near, who had seen any thing or know any thing whatever of these proceedings. The very next morning, with shoulders the farmer laughed a horse laugh; the landed gentleman visited over his claret a large grunt. His Majesty's proclamation, posted up at hallgates and at fences, was torn down or daubed with mud. The local roll-call was found memorably silenced. Somebody may have had information to give, but nobody was found inclined to it.

Very there lived at that time at Poolbridge, in Hampshire, close adjoining, a shoemaker named Daniel Chater, who was in receipt of a small pension for time with the spirit of these time and neighborhood, and who had for both kinds of reasons been poor; a distraint for rent may have been hanging over him. Money, by a certain day and hour, may have been absolutely necessary to save him from ruin or disgrace. This man knew Dymond, and it happened that the acquaintance had professed at daylight, after the breaking open of the custom-house, through Poolbridge. How little Chater would have had any say one way or the other in the large would be as base as to betray the party in evidence by a touching circumstance. Seeing Chater standing in his little garden by the mud-side, Dymond stopped one of the horses, dismounted, and shaking hands with his acquaintance over the fence, conversed with him for a moment. Dymond then drove on with the rest of the gang. After the King's proclamation was read, a suspicion had, somehow or other, arisen against Dymond; Chater then recalled this fact, and felt no doubt that he was one of the party. Chater accordingly opened a correspondence with the custom-house officers, one of whom, a Mr. Galley, was then in communication with a letter to Major Batten, a Sussex Justice of the Peace, which instructions to pass through Poolbridge, and to call upon Daniel Chater for the following their business secret, as they hoped to escape the vengeance of the smugglers.

The shoemaker and his companion rode away quietly through the Sussex lanes, taking counsel by the way that they came from their object, where they were forced to inquire after Major Batten. They then found that the Justice of the Peace was at Stanstead, near Rowland Castle. To this place they accordingly set out, going through Leigh, where they were entertained at dinner, and Alton, and asked of them their way. The Austins were going in the same direction, and were able to direct them. All this had caused delay; and, on arriving after Major Batten, they had been compelled to put their horses into the hands of grooms—a revelation which, if the officer should happen to be known to any one in that party, might have been dangerous. But the officer had come from Southampton, many miles off, and had no opportunity, or, perhaps, inclination, to inquire, was clearly to go on without delay upon their business. Just, running down to the kitchen to get a cup of tea and the Sunday about noon, and being hot and weary, they stopped at the White Hart, a good inn kept by Mr. Austin, in the village of Alton, near Selborne, in the same village. Payne it still is common usage, when the family of the master of the family had no doubt too deep a rout in the neighborhood to be without the common feeling of the place and time. They were slightly known about them men. One of them, at least, was a good judge of meat, and, as they sat down to their eating and drinking, she called Austin, their receiving guide, aside, and told him "she was afraid they were not what they seemed to be." They, after a fensive suspicion had never crossed the mind of Austin. He said that they were going to Major Batten's—that he "did not suspect any harm, for they were merely carrying a letter to the Major."

This, however, was enough to put the host on the correctness of her surmises, and she privately sent one of her blacksmith sons, who was then in the house, to Major Batten, to warn Austin and William Carter, who lived hard by. What the son was sent to tell them he wanted to be going, and asked for their horses; but Mrs. Payne told them that the man was gone out with the key of the stables, and that he was riding, which, it is supposed, was but a trick of hers to occasion delay. Austin and Carter, however, had no doubt of "a pot of hot" and while that was getting ready Carter privately left the White Hart, mounted his own saddle, and told them her suspicions concerning the two strangers, who were going with a letter to Major Batten. The Justice advised George Austin to go away about his business, telling him "as he supposed they had a warrant to search for the officer and his friend; but, with a strange hesitation, they lingered about the house waiting for the stable-key. So far from taking alarm at the number of men who now came dropping in one after the other, they satisfied themselves as finding as much good company, and smoked and drank till their business almost faded from their minds. Dusk was coming on, and, although not drunk, they were hardly in a fit condition to do their work properly, and were probably in a very unsafe temper for the delicate duty of arresting a gentleman, and a justice of the peace. Chater grew sleepy-eyed, and talked foolishly about himself and his wrongs, and about a great many men hod been shoemakers. Jackson, taking advantage of this, talked with Dymond apart, and asked him how he did, and where Dymond, the shepherd, was. Chater said he believed he was in the house, and that he did not know; adding, like a fool, as indeed the drink had made him, "that he was a very good shepherd himself, which he was sorry for, but could not help it."

Galley soon after came into the garden, suspecting that Jackson was persuading him not to persist in giving information to the revenue; and upon Galley's desiring his friend to come in, Jackson said, "What is that to you?" and, being a powerful man, struck the unfortunate revenue-officer a blow which set his mouth and nose bleeding, and which, Jackson afterward, in self-defensively, said he was the King's officer. Upon which, with another oath, "You a King's officer? I'll make a King's officer of you!" and another gift, "I'll serve you so again." Offering to strike him again, one of the Payne cried, "Don't be such a fool; do you know what you are doing?"

The two strangers now became uneasy, and wanted, at all events, to be going; and Jackson, Carter, and the rest of the smuggling party perceived that something was necessary to be done at once. It up; for they were sorry, they said, for what had happened. Night having now overtaken them, it would be very unpleasant to ride in the dark through a nation. They decided to stay, and the party sat down again together in the house at the hour for closing the door of the White Hart, but the whole of the guests remained. Their number had increased—and this fact alone ought to have alarmed the officer and his companion still more; but they were now in a state of mind which disregarded of seeing the only friend of the Government in the whole neighborhood, and talked of bringing down the smuggling party to assault and sometime in his foolish eyes, the room became a court of law, in which he held forth, to a ninety-looking judge and jury, upon the wickedness of smuggling; for, blinded by his drunken folly, he did not see the darkening faces of the men about him, nor note the ominous silence in which they listened to his virgin words. Nor was Galley more sober, although, with the habitual prudence of his profession, he nudged his friend from time to time, and bade him hold his tongue. In this state the two were at last led up to bed.

And now the White Hart doors are closed; the place is shut up, the lights are out, save in one room—the room in which the strangers had been sitting—where the company that they had left there still lingered—not a one of them offering to stir. Smoothing was in the minds of all; although, perhaps, not one of them knew exactly what was to be done. Nor did any vision visit the two strangers, with a sudden shudder of fear, that they were to pass them from their drunken sleep, or warn them of the horrors of that night.

After a while two of the gang stole up stairs, listening at the door. Hearing the snoring of the drunken men, they entered the room. Here they found Galley and Chater lying in their clothes upon the bed, and, without any more ado, or with any much too sound asleep to heed them, they took from his pocket the letter to the justice. This was then handed down the road in the kitchen to the smugglers, to whom it revealed exactly the deceiver's errand. The inflamed their rage still more; and they held a consultation as to what was to be done. One proposed to take them both to the sea-side, to Emsworth, to murder them, and throw them in. One, more humane, offered to the letter open, and read it to them, to show them that was objected to, as there was a probability of their coming back and betraying every thing. Another, still more humane agreed, he would take them away to some place, where they should be confined till the business was what should be the fate of Dymond, the shepherd; and, in the mean time, all should allow threepence a week to support them, and contribute it. Another urged that Dymond, should there should be the same. But the majority were in no mood for mercy or delay. The wives of both Jackson and Carter were present; and Jackson's wife sprang up, and, with a furious shout, declared that "if they let them escape they'd they come to hang us?" But even this was far from satisfying their cruel purpose.

Up to this time the movement. He went up into the room in which the two men were lying, and, having fastened the door, he seized a large poker on his horseman's boots, he sprang upon the bed, and began to strike the sleepers on the face and head with the poker. He struck till they were covered with blood; beating them at the same time with a short, thick cudgel which he also had brought. Jackson's wife encouraged him, and, when the men got up, and found themselves seized at once, and dragged down stairs. Prayers for mercy were brought them only oaths, and blows, and warnings that they were to be hanged. Jackson's wife took them out of the house; but one of their number returned to the room for the letter, which he swore that he would shoot through the head any person who should mention what he had seen or heard.

Meanwhile, having taken their horses from the stable, and mounted two men of their own (which were found afterward, stained with blood, by the road-side), they placed them both upon one horse, "binding their legs together under the belly; Jackson having acted particularly for a time as their guide. Before they had proceeded they proceeded a little way, when Jackson, who was like a furious maniac, cried out, "Why not, you cut their throats now?" And then all fell upon them with whips, save the one who was leading the horse; for the roads were so bad that they were obliged to go slowly. That fury tortured the men till they came to Woodcot, which we may hold to have been the place where they began. Here their victims, writhing with the pain, fell off, with their heads under the horse; their legs, which were bound together over the back. When their tormentors found this they set them upright again, and continued their journey, with the cry, "Lie, lie!" and shoulders till they came to Dean, about half a mile further; the horse still going at a very slow pace, and the sufferers, over the rarity, broken roads, which increased their agony. Here they slipped, and threw the horse again, as before, with their feet in the air.

This time, however, they were weak to get up upon the horse at all; upon which the tormentors separated them, and two of the smugglers mounted upon Payne's horse. Carter they left to Galley, on his back, where the torture was continued, till the two smugglers, themselves receiving a blow from Galley, cut to the others to desist. All this time Jackson rode beside the two men, with a pistol in each hand, swearing that the groaned loudly he would blow their brains out. They then agreed to go up with them to Harris's house, at Rowland's Castle, which was the property of John Caryll, a Catholic gentleman, and a friend of the past Popes. Here they left Galley fixed on his horse, meaning to throw him down into the well. The wretched man rejoiced at this, begging them to let him do so, and to put an end to his misery. But even the dooms fell to fall off once more, and they had to remount him on the saddle, with his hands downward, as a leather does a calf, and once tripped and fell over a bank near the house. But the poor fellow groaned very much, and cried aloud that he could not bear it; and at last said, "I am falling, I am falling." One of the gang giving him a push, he fell heavily, and some thought he had broken his neck and was dead; although, from a horrible circumstance afterward discovered, it was known that he was not.

It should be mentioned, in considering these barbarities as an indication of the feeling against the revenue-officers in those days, that not one of these men had any direct interest in the case of Dymond and the smuggled tea, which had been taken out of the custom-house at Poole, a place further distant from them than London, and separated by a whole county. Nor were they, in the usual sense, smugglers, or importers of smuggled goods; but were only persons interested in smuggling, more or less.

So little was Galley to be dead, they then laid him upon a horse; and as they were going up a dirty lane, one said, "Let us kick a place to carry them in." So little were they afraid of discovery, that they went to the house of one Pescod, and, knocking at the door, the master being in bed, demanded why he said they had got two men whom they wanted to bring into the house. The girl told them her father was ill. But they insisting that she should go up and ask him to let them in, she did, and returned to say that her father would not allow her body to be brought there; and the men returned for their carriage.

It was now some hours past midnight; the weather being very raw and cold. Coming to the house of Pescod, they went with the bodies into the hatched of the Red Lion there, and his family, at the same down and made them a fire, and got them feed. They now told the landlord that they had had an engagement with some officers, had lost their horses, and were afraid that several of the people were killed. The body of Galley they kept concealed in a low manner at the back of the premises. When they had refreshed themselves they went away; but one of them shortly after came back to the house, and told the host that he had left a place hard by where he had before concealed some goods. The landlord said he remembered it, but he could not go with them. The smugglers insisted he should; and they then took a candle, a dark lantern, and spade, and went away, and returned the rest. Coming to the spot they were in a thick copse-wood pulley, deep down among briers and withered leaves—they began to look for him, the landlord of the Red Lion watching with them. His curious attention to the fact of digging, and next morning, he helped, and did not think what it was for. At this late they hastily thrust the body of Galley, all stained with blood, in his blood-stained clothes—dead, as they thought him; but a terrible incident was put forward found that he was alive. He remained, for his hands were discovered held up to his face, as if to keep the dirt, as they shovelled it upon him, out of his mouth and eyes.

Thus did poor Galley at length find release from his barbarous murderers. He was not dead, however, it was milder and more merciful in its speedy end than that which befell the shoemaker, who was left to die by the side of the body of his dress. Where they had buried Galley, all the gang save two, returned to the White Hart, and there sat eating, drinking, and smoking the whole of the day. The two that had not joined them were found in charge of Daniel Chater's unresisting victim; who, losing the influence, and the chief cause of this part of the day's proceedings, determined to submit to even worse torture than his companion had endured. Mills, an old man, and his companion, accordingly led him to a place called a shilling, or turf house, belonging to Mills, and there set him down on the border of a lane and nostrils, save when a breath of wind came to his relief, and then he could hear the carriages and passengers. On the Wednesday, being the third night after the outrage at Rowland's Castle, the whole gang met at the Red Lion, to consult what further cruelties to inflict on Chater, who was still alive. "Let us dispatch him," said "Let us hold a gun, clap the muzzle to his head, and we will tie a long string to the trigger, when we will all of us lay hold of it and fire it off." But this was rejected, "as it would put him out of his pain too soon." Finally, they left the Red Lion, and went to the house of Harris's, in Ladybolt Park, there to treat him as they had intended to treat Galley.

Up to this time Chater was suffering the most horrible torture; being continually visited by one or other of the enemies, who came to the hole and struck him cruel blows. When at length the whole party came down to the turf house, Tupner, and Mills, and Pescod, sat a long time in talk, and dancing and gesticulating like a madman, rushed at the wretched man, and cut a long gash, exclaiming, "Down on your knees to prayers!" The poor shoemaker accordingly knelt down slowly and feebly, and, as he did so, began to pray; but when he was so engaged, one of their number went behind him and struck him, agricultural-like, with a "preaching villain," and saying, "We have done for Galley, and we will do for you!" Then Tupner, in the wantonness of provocation the poor man who was indeed now too weak and wretched even to complain, and with his face bent down to the knife across his nose, whereby he almost cut both his eyes out. Still the wretched creature only uttered a groan, and let his head fall. Tupner was not yet satisfied, rushed at him in another fit of frenzy and violation, and, but this time with a knife, so that the knife made a deep gash across his forehead.

They then placed him on a horse, and set out for Harris's Well, Tupner whipping him all the way, till coming to a deep hollow, they threw him down, and swore if the blood should stain the saddle he would destroy him instantly. Then, for the second night, they came to the well in the park, which was between twenty and thirty feet deep, and ordered the wounded to keep the cattle from falling in. Tupner then pulled a cord out of his pocket, and tied it with a noose round the neck of their victim, and took him get over the palos to the well. The poor man, scarcely unwilling to obey, pulling at the noose commenced by some decayed palos, would have gone through this, but was prevented by the others, who would not have it over, having all the while the rope round his neck, and being extremely weak.

As soon as he had got over the palos, Tupner took one end of the rope and tied it round the rail in the opening where the poles were broken, there being no roller to the well, which was dry and abandoned. They then pushed him into the well; but the length of the rope would not suffer his body to reach within knee-deep in it, so that the upper part appeared above the low brick parapet, hanging by the rope about the neck. Here, however, as his body leaned against the wall, the weight did not strangle him; and, after a quarter of an hour, they got over into the rope, and dropped him headforemost, down. They then listened, and could still hear him groan. At this they went to a man who had a gardener, and who lived by, and asked him to lend them a ladder and a rope, which he did; but they could not move the ladder, and returned without it to the well, where they could still hear the unfortunate Chaser feebly moaning. At this, they opened the old gate-posts that were lying on the ground there for firewood. They cast down the gate-posts with some heavy stones; when, listening again, they could hear nothing, and were satisfied that he was dead. After that they killed the dog that they had stolen, took Mr. Ellis off, and cut it into small pieces, and made away with them, to prevent any discovery. Galley's body was not found till long after. Chaser, who discovered in the well, presented a piteous spectacle, with the rope about his neck. His eyes appeared to be cut or pecked out; his tongue and ears were gone, and the flesh "came short off" when they lifted the body.

At least fifteen persons were actively engaged in these horrible murders. Many others had been spooly spectators of much that had been done, and had rendered assistance to the confederates both for three days they had gone about the country; but the Government could obtain no tidings whatever of the missing men. Galley's body was found all blood-stained by the road-side, as we have stated, and it was supposed that they had been either murdered or carried abroad by the smugglers, but how no one appeared to know. A proclamation was issued, with a large reward; but for seven months no information was received as to who were the murderers. At length, however, in the usual course of such histories, a magistrate received a letter from one who had withstood some part of their proceedings; and, shortly after, one of the murderers coming in, and voluntarily surrendering himself, mercy from first to last was sworn he became King's evidence, and the greater number were tried and sentenced to be hanged—some of them in chains.

While awaiting their execution, being all brutal and stupid dunces and well ignorant, it gave them behaved with extreme levity, eating and drinking regularly without any seeming concern, and talking freely to the people who, according to the custom of the time, were allowed to come in and see them. On the day appointed, a great crowd of sixty, asked the clergyman, gayly, when he thought they should be hanged. Being removed, he answered that, "According to the common course of nature, he could not have lived above a year or two longer: that, as to the world, it gave him little trouble, as he had but small hand in it. As to the charge of smuggling, he owned he had been concerned in it for a great many years; but that he did not think there was any harm in it. He said, he did not remember to have done anything worse done; though, if he had, he should not have thought it any great crime." One said, he "had had many engagements with the Custom-house officers and been wounded three times." Another, when asked they must go by water, he answered, "What a-devil do they mean by that? Could not they do our whole business last night, without stirring us out now again, and vex us and disquiet us?" But there were some hats handed; and Jackson, one of the crudest of the wretches, was so sooner measured for the chains in which he was to be hung; than he was struck with such terror that he died in a few hours after. The others, however, was unchanged to the last. He cursed the executioner for making him measure on tip-toe, and bade him "not hang him by inches."

We live in a better age; but many foolish surgeons are still attentive on severe punishments, as well, violating great principles, and needlessly prevent-ing the smuggler's trade in certain articles of tea or three times greater amount than the value of the goods themselves—most of these articles comprising, like tea and brandy, a large value in a small bulk. The risk of carrying such things, like all other risks, is more or less justly estimated and insured against, at a certain price. When this price is less than the duty, smuggling; in spite of customs-houses and coast-guard, is certain, the revenue will be cheated, and the bold smuggler rises over shadow of his old popularity.

CHAPTER III.

FIVE next two years of Mrs. Armour's life were of a chequered and cheerful character. Happy in thriving, her children well and happy, while, for the first time since she was married, there was no thing on her mind on secret anxiety or trouble to keep down.

And now it was that the schoolmaster thought of maturing his plan for crushing opposition, and for triumphantly bringing the enemy over to his own side.

Civil wars have been brought to a close, yet kingdoms restored, deeply-seated feuds have been healed by a process similar to that contemplated by Mr. Holiday. The rival Roses were blended in the persons of Elizabeth and Henry; Ferdinand and Isabella joined kingdoms when they joined hands; and the long-standing hostility between even the houses of Montague and Capulet meant to extinguish their ancient enmity in the same way, had not a tragic fate stepped in to prevent it: so that the man of authority had many precedents to encourage him, and went forward nothing doubting. Surprised, therefore, was the schoolmaster when the lady said "No."

Ten years had revolved, and the anniversary of the day on which George Armour first crossed his threshold had come round. It was a Sunday—a mid-summer Sunday morning, still and balmy.

By-and-by, the country people, as the villagers call them, came dropping in: young blooming women with their children, middle-aged matrons, old faces of a true which cast even the curtains of the time-shaken pews, and the very cushions of the trees, whose dreary days are over, with chubby tanned children keeping close behind them: there were the sturdy yeomen and their wives, their fathers, husbands, and brothers stand about outside, talking, till they see the minister go in.

At last the congregation are all in.

Mrs. Armour was present too. It would have been something like a miracle if one of her children had been missed from their accustomed seat. The shadows of the windows were all cast on the pavilion—sung heartily, if not scientifically—floated out to join the universal hymn of nature.

The text was read and the sermon began, when an unusual incident occurred.

The leaden casement, bringing up a passage on one side of the church, in the manner which he purposed heard likely to attract attention, but which sat at the other side below, and which opened on the opposite gallery, who had him fully under their eyes, would see whether it was open or shut. He wanted to catch for the purpose of instant ejectment. But no; when he arrived at Mrs. Armour's seat he found it open, sitting at the window sill, and whispered a few words; that individual nodged and whispered back, and so all the way he marched Mrs. Armour, when, the seat being narrow, five people rose and stood in the aisle till the gat out, much wondering what was the matter, and other wondered or carried abroad by the smugglers, but how no one appeared to know. A proclamation was issued, with a large reward; but for seven months no information was received as to who were the murderers. At length, however, in the usual course of such histories, a magistrate received a letter from one who had withstood some part of their proceedings; and, shortly after, one of the murderers coming in, and voluntarily surrendering himself, mercy from first to last was sworn he became King's evidence, and the greater number were tried and sentenced to be hanged—some of them in chains.

THE DOUBLE WIDOWHOOD.

[CONCLUDED FROM OUR LAST.]

CHAPTER III.

DURING eight years that had been tossing from one State of the American Union to another, sometimes working industriously, and hoarding his meagre pecuniary gains, sometimes idling, and losing both his sense and his money in intoxication and riot, George Armour had known many wicked jests of the crew he was among, upon the letter line, which they knew gave him sore distress. They dwelled him, in a cautious sort of way, before for any thing he had done, or was doing, he did not know, except that sin brought suffering on him in his own person. On the contrary, he valued himself upon the fact that he was not so bad as some others.

Then came the news which roused all the more wicked and adventurous blackguards of the world.

There was gold in California, gold to be had for the lifting. At the first blush of this intelligence, George Armour, in company with bands of the reckless and the wicked, set out for the land of gold. Gold quickly shook by left his hands clutching it, his fingers closing on it. The floating scum of every city of Europe set in for the golden centre. The multitudes dwelt in tents. Tents are suggestive of an age of innocence and wandering shepherds, or of a well-drilled and disciplined military army; but these tents sheltered crime of every dye under heaven. George Armour was not behind. He drank; he gambled; he drank; he gambled; and went gold-seeking again. This life of alternate experience of success, of gold in his coat-tails, of gold in his pocket, and, which in a different course of conduct, and with ordinary care, might have served him for the sweetest limits of a life.

It was rough nursing any one got at the digging; and even the memories of his, in after time, rose to an enormous price. So, shaken as he was, George Armour resolved to try his luck once again; and this time, to keep his own counsel and his gold, and make for home. He was lucky, even in this last adventure; and he no sooner landed in England than he embarked his capital in freighting a ship with the store most likely to sell well in gold fields. By this venture he came rich.

He hung about England for a time, but not getting letter—but, if any thing, rather worse—he came to Edinburgh, and consulted medical men there. They told him, that, by strict temperance and regularity, he might have a chance for his life; but that otherwise he had not a day to run. He is come to that, though he, I may as well go home. This thought led him to seek Mr. Boyd, and inquire of him as to his children's prospects; and he was answered in a few words, as we have seen, at her door on that Saturday forenoon.

If he had any feeling of shame at all, when he entered his wife's house, it was very faint indeed. He still retained the idea that he was a person better than many he had known; and when he looked back on his past career, it was in a dim sort of way of saying something of an introductory kind, that he thought it was a necessary question. He had not deserted his wife and family, he could say to see him again; and he gave her a sketch of his history, not containing any of the more glaring facts, but such as were only faintly hinted at, but filled in with sundry cock-and-bull stories, calculated to leave the impression that he was a victim of circumstances rather than otherwise—which indeed was his own conviction.

She listened to his account; but in a few days found that, whatever of hardship he had undergone, he had not undergone any change as a seeking man; and that if, as he said, he had made money, he was determined to part with as little of it as possible.

The school had to be given up; he could not bear it. Mary Magie and Miss Galer therefore stopped their annuity. Miss Bogle insisted on it, although Miss Galer, left to herself, would gladly have continued it. She had not a penny but the allowance which her husband doled out to her as if he had made it himself. Mary Magie was a place like that ought, he said, to cost next to nothing.

Even in his weak state, he felt the life he was condemned to was a hard one to endure. His children, although told that he was their father, had not the slightest affection for him—they rather instinctively disliked him: he saw this, and imagining them to be spies upon him, generally sent them away from his presence when they came.

Neither was he looked upon by the public with any overflowing love. In fact, he was universally disliked by his approaches. There was one exception, however; a man of the name of M'Coll, whom he had known already in early life, and whom he now found established in the locality as a lawyer in a small way. He did not know his character in the district; was mean of soul, and grasping. But George, even if he had been inclined, could not afford to be generous; and when he got a penny, M'Coll accompanied him in his rides, and found him business enough to keep him from which hung so heavy on his hands. The entire change from his former habits to comparative quiet, and the want of excitement, told on his health, although it was short-lived.

The poor man, in his daily bearing, M'Coll's attentions grew the more constant, till at last he was a daily visitor, and even, when it became necessary, invited himself to dinner. Mrs. Armour by taking turns with sitting up at night with him. Jennie also showed him kindness; but the latter was not so far as fatigue was concerned, the relief was most welcome. Although, how this man should be interested, Mrs. Armour, to the sick-soul a weak, querulous man, evidently dying, who had not even the claim of relationship on him, was more than she could account for; evidently the thought, he must be a kind-hearted man in reality, although, if he could help it, he would have never preferred another sort of companion for her husband's last days.

It was not long, however, before the riddle was read to her very plainly and rather unexpectedly.

One day, George seemed to be more excited than usual, and told his wife that he expected M'Coll in the evening, and that she might go to bed as early as she liked, for he would not want any thing, and she would be the better for a sound sleep.

It is amazing how faint a breath will blow into life the embers of dying affection. These latter words of George's filled Mrs. Armour with a most cherished spirit of his wife like dew upon the withered grass. Whatever the husband was just about expiring of sheer starvation, and she grasped at these words as if her ingenuity could make a meal of them. Poor creature, so little was she accustomed to any consideration from this quarter, that these few words—which any lady would have said from mere humanity, actually brightened her eye, and made her step lighter. It was a brief glimmer of happiness, and the last remembrance of her husband's heartlessness.

True to his appointment, M'Coll came, and Jennie observed in him that slight, and, on the part of the individual, unconscious difference of manner which distinguishes the person having business in view from the same person with thoughts wholly free. Jennie was not what is called a sharp, clever woman, for less a jealous, suspicious one, yet she could not help thinking there was something more than usual to take place between these two men.

Her husband, for the sake of thorough ventilation, occupied the largest room in the house—not very large after all—the best-slept in what was little more than a hole in the wall, although in this apartment, and was in the habit of leaving her door half open, that she might hear readily, and be instantly at the alert if required.

As had been proposed, she had gone early to bed; but could not for hours, although aware of many things, it was long before she slept; however, sleep at last she did. She was a light sleeper, and, on hearing a noise, she was at once awake, she suddenly awake, owing to the glare of a candle being shed over her face; it was not that, however, however, that it was being withdrawn, and the new M'Coll in the act of moving away with it in his hand. He crossed the room to the bed's-side, and she heard him say: "She's as sound as a top." Her curiosity was excited, and raising herself gently on her elbow, she listened; the door being turned round on its hinges, she could see through the opening. George was sitting up in bed with an inexplicable expression on his thin wasted face, and a frame gazed at her in a feeling of profound and unutterable pity. Many times, as she had sat watching him, her heart had sprung to her lips, and her feelings were almost forth, but knowing the stinging reprobate she was likely to meet, she had kept them down. On this forenoon's gleam of kindness—perhaps it might be the beginning of a change. M'Coll, too, came within the range of her vision as she stood by the door: him steady a small stool on the edge of the bed, spread a sheet of paper on it, set ink close by, and drew the candle nearer.

Then George asked: "Have you got witnesses?"

"All right," replied M'Coll; "when we are ready for them, I can have them in, and get their names down in a second."

"Begin, then," said Armour.

And M'Coll, in a low voice, began to write, to George's dictation, what Jennie instantly discovered to be his will. She listened to the end, and heard him bequeath all that he had to his loving and faithful friend, Simon M'Coll, as if neither she nor her children had been in existence. That, then, was his kindness, his consideration! She saw M'Coll assist him up into a position to sign the document, and gave him the pen for that purpose, when, for her children's sake, although resisting struggles, she sprang forward, and, laying her long white night-dress, glided across the floor. The men were so occupied, that neither of them observed her till she had her hand on her husband's arm, and said: "George, if you have no regard for me, think of the children, for they are flesh and blood. Will you go direct to the other world with a piece of iniquity like that to answer for?" and she pointed to the will which he had just signed. Then, turning to the other, she said: "M'Coll, you were once a friend to my husband and a ghost-like, and her voice so soft and solemn, that these men, although they were not awed, were moved before her. A few moments passed, and M'Coll, filling the useless paper, said: "I suppose, Armour, I may as well go."

"Yes, go now," replied George; "and come back to-morrow night, and we'll see what's to be done—I'll think over it."

M'Coll shook away; he had still enough of confidence in his friend to be aware that, if he returned the following evening, Mrs. Armour had had in her husband's bedside; and that in these handsome features fixed and ghastly in death. He turned quickly away—he did not like to look behind now—then, George's eyes were also quick in his usual state of health till four o'clock that afternoon, when he fell asleep, and never woke again.

Now my story is really done, except that I must say that Jennie remained in her native country, and left much under her independent in a moderate way; and that her children grew up to be a comfort and an honor to her.

THE SHIPWRECK OF THE "JEANIE JOHNSON."

We give herewith an engraving of the terrible destruction of a ship, its captain's wife and child, and the crew of the British bark Jeanie Johnson, which was consumed at sea on the 31st of October. The Jeanie Johnson sailed from Quebec for Hull, with a cargo of deals, on 8th October. On this the terrible gale which for some so much misfortune struck her, and she began to make water. On the day she was 150 miles to the west of Cape Clear, and the pumps were washed away. We give the remainder of the story in the captain's own words:

"At about seven o'clock I turned in to the main rigging, as they did not know the moment the vessel might go over. My wife was in bed with the child, with her child, and I came to her and told her that 'we must all take to the main rigging.' She got up and dressed herself and the child, and she would go. So great was the fire then, that in a very few minutes I had to leave her—forget that she had been containing it had been washed overboard, except the mizzen-mast part of the vessel, near the forestalk, which we could not get near, on account of the heavy sea that were now always rolling in interruptedly over the vessel. We were, consequently, without water. We secured ourselves in the maintop with canvas and ropes, which served us for shelter also. We could not sleep any, scarcely, that night. At seven o'clock the next morning, 23d, we saw a sail to leeward; she was also a bark, and she passed within about a mile of us. We managed to set a signal of distress, but the bark passed us without taking any notice of it, and we supposed that she did not see it. The storm continued in rage violently, and we were in continual danger, expecting the mainmast to go over the ship's side. The 23d was spent in a miserable manner by the whole of us. Our clothes were wet. We could not stretch ourselves, but were all huddled together without room to stir. Some of the men went down to the top of the deck-house for the purpose of stretching their legs. My child was quiet, sometimes slept a little, and occasionally cried for a drink, which he could not get. I can not say that my wife was more frightened than any of the rest of us, or that she said more about the danger. We kept our flag of distress flying constantly, but no vessel hove in sight after the bark passed until the 24th. On the 23d we all began to feel the want of fresh water. Every part of the vessel, except the upper part of the cabin and the mast, was always under water. On the night of the 23d some of the men slept on the roof of the cabin, and every night afterward till we were rescued.

On the 24th, at noon, we saw a ship to leeward of us and to the westward; but she did not notice us. I sometimes managed to get down from the rigging to stretch my limbs; but my wife never came down from the time she went up but once, when she tried to take a sleep in the cabin. This was on the sixth day after she went up to the mainmast. She no sooner lay down, however, than a large sea came over the stern of the ship, washing into the cabin, and sweeping away the bed she was sleeping on, and drenching herself and the child with water. She then went up to the rigging again, and never came down afterward till the vessel came along to rescue us. On the night of the 24th our rudder was unshipped by a heavy sea, which also carried away the counter under it, and the ship was then perfectly unmanageable, and tossed round and round by the wind and waves. The want of water was greatly felt by every one on board now. On the 26th some light showers fell, but they were so dashed about by the force and fury of the wind that we could not catch them in the sails, and were glad to receive some drops which fell from the rigging into our mouths, though they tasted strongly of salt and tar. This was the first supply of water we received; and before we got it we were nearly exhausted for the want of it. My wife's lips were almost parched, and I was ready to faint myself from weakness. The water broke me sick; and when the rain was over we were nearly as thirsty as ever. On the 28th we had another supply of rain, which we drank in the same way as the first we got. This water was better than the other — not so brackish, and more of it. We were relieved by this supply considerably. We could not eat the salt beef but it would produce thirst, and we were frequently obliged to slice the raw potatoes and eat them, that their juice might wet our mouths. We also got small pieces of lead into our mouths, and kept chewing them to keep our mouths cool; and we found that this allayed our thirst in some measure.

The weather continued much the same way as I have described it; the wind blowing from the same point that it had been blowing from all along, until the evening of the 29th, when the hurricane shifted to the north, and we had intense cold.

"We were now exhausted for want of proper sleep or a place to stretch ourselves; and this cold with the change in the wind almost drove me on to despair. My wife was now the greatest sufferer. She could not stretch her limbs at all, and was completely benumbed and thirst. My child was also suffering very much from the same causes, and cried aloud for. The wind continued in the same point until the 30th and 31st, and the weather continued cold. On the 30th some water, hail, and rain fell. We caught some of the hail, and relieved our thirst more than we had hitherto been able to do. About 4 o'clock on the afternoon of the 31st we espied a sail to windward; she bore down on us, and passed under our stern after 6 o'clock. She proved to be the Dutch bark Sophia Hendrich, Captain Vanderleef, from Amsterdam, bound to New York. The captain then came to leeward, and hove his vessel to close by us. He then spoke us, thus:

"'Have you any bread?—We have not.' He then lowered his quarter-boat and sent her over to us. Five of us got into her, and she conveyed us to the Sophia Elizabeth again. There was a very heavy sea running at the time, and it was with great peril that the boat got to us. She then made two other trips, and took the remainder of us off; and it was after six o'clock in the evening when we were all safely seated and the vessel again on her course. Of course we left the week she was moored in the same condition as when her rudder had been unshipped, and the next day about in all directions. We could scarcely move when we were roused; but we met with great kindness from the captain and crew of the Sophia Elizabeth. I could not say why; but to touch any fruit for several days, and even to-day my taste came no some pale. The limbs of every one of us became so sore that we could not walk the deck of the vessel for the first two or three days. My wife and child were very sick and suffered much after the wreck, and my wife could not stretch her limbs for nine days. From this fact we infer that women suffer still delicate from the effects of their sufferings. I will always feel deeply grateful to the captain and crew who rescued me and my wife and child from the condition we were in on board the wreck."

AN OPIUM-SMOKING SALOON.

The engraving on preceding page will give a fair idea of the famous opium-smoking saloons which abound in all Chinese cities. The habit of smoking opium, and the fatal consequences which usually have already been described in this journal.

Around the room in which the opium-smokers sit are placed wooden or cane couches, with wooden pillows for the head, these being chosen in preference to softer materials as being cooler. A girl minister to the wants of the debauchees—lights their pipes, gives them cups of tea they desire it, and finally, when they are overcome by the drug, helps to carry them into an inner apartment. Two pipes, each of which is about the length and size of whiffs, will overcome a beginner; an old hand will continue smoking for a long time. The accompaniment of the Illustrated London News thus describes the scene depicted in the engraving:

"In the house devoted to their use, these infatuated people may be seen, at nine o'clock in the evening, in all the different stages. Some are entering, impatient to feed the craving appetite they have been obliged to exhibit during the day; others lounging and talking under the effect of the pipe; while the couches around are filled with their different occupants, in the last stage, while an idiot smile upon their countenances proves them too completely under the influence of the drug to regard passing events, and feet seem unable to be checked for consumption. The last scene of this tragic play is generally to be seen in the streets of the suburbs, where a corpse, or dead-house, where its those who have passed into the state of bliss the opium-pipe can bestow, with an emblem of the long sleep to which he is blindly hastening."

OUR SPECIAL EUROPEAN CORRESPONDENCE.

PARIS, November, 1858.

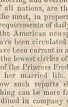
I do not know why—it is, perhaps, because I am growing old—but this impression is often more colored by one's inward sensations than by outward objects—but certainly the first aspect of Paris does now fill me with joy rather than sadness, as of yore, when reaching it from its sunnier and seaboard sister capital. But certainly not look enchanting yesterday. There was fog and a chill easterly wind. The Boulevards and the Rue de la Paix are in all the dirtier and wet state of the consequent upon the laying down of a huge sewer, which is to carry them all that way, and convey every desirable project, but not pretty to witness in execution, and seeming to dim the glories of the shop-windows and to make them look as if in a fog.

This afternoon a bright October sun made a drive in the Bois de Boulogne pleasant; and there all is in order, and so well-ordered and wellkept and giving amusing enjoyment and life to the many persons, not only to the "carriage people" (to make use of an English vulgar expression), but to groups of sauntering pedestrians and those larger families of "Pa" and "Ma" and two babies which one sees so commonly in the public walks and gardens in France. Papa carries the baby proper, and mamma leads or our other brother. There they are, the Parisian family. I will never by be incensed in number, only when baby and brother must get tired and be carried. But as to prices one that, in fine weather, one always sees these family groups, which is in England, in the same class, are strictly confined to the monday; and one wonders how they can afford to be idle on other day's here. I suppose it is their way to faire soirée days and name days, etc.

It is the improvement in the Bois de Boulogne which, I should think, have done more to reconcile the Parisians with Louis Napoleon than any other of the great and manifold improvements which his perverse liberality has given to their capital. Indeed, when one hears that "the Emperor is unpopular," one is tempted to inquire "for what reason" excepting that of the historical fickleness of the people. Even the Red Republicans will admit that their country can require "a master" and "a strong government," and that they do not understand or appreciate liberty as it is understood and valued in other countries where it is as essential as the breath or the blood of life. I, for one, never held a higher place among the nations than at this moment, and the interest which its real prosperity are day by day augmenting. There are, to be sure, some ugly statistics showing a decreasing population; and that in consequence, as pointed out by the tendency of the working-classes to congregate in towns, and by past years of insufficient harvests and disturbed government; and, upon the whole, I do not believe the French have been more suitably governed since the days of Louis XVIII. than they are now. Indeed, I have heard many Legitimists say so personal and are they of this, that should they, by the death of the duke de Bordeaux, be released from their present allegiance, their party would rally to the Emperor Louis Napoleon in preference to the Comte de Paris or any other of the Orleans family.

One missed, in one's drive to-day, the presence of the ever-lovely Empress and the little Prince and his imposing escort. And if Napoleon ait mais pour dire la vérité, one missed all one's loves and admirations. There were many strangers—Russians, Italians, Brazilians, Chilians, Mexicans, and Americans—and equipages of every kind, but latter are in numbers in Paris, as usual at this season, and invading the best shops, and toying with thing most statiques and recherchés; and what they reject will be rot aside by the artful marchands for the less discriminating English jeune filles. The autumnal fashions have not really appeared. They are kept back always until after the 1st of November—all Saints' Day. When the solemnity and sadness of that day and the succeeding, le jour des morts, are passed, then the gayeties of winter commence. Another day I shall, aided by some lady friend, be able to give you more on this subject. I am sure, will be thought not the least interesting part of my letter by your lady readers.

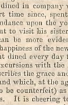
I have not yet had the English friend who drove me to the Bois de Boulogne, and who is to be my companion the winter of 1858-9. Then, so told me with a grumbling tone, "my countryman had secured all the best apartments, for which I am to pay a very exorbitant price." The English complain very much of us for this. They have, as it were, created in consequence of the influx of the subjects of the Princes Frederick William of Prussia in her married life. It seems strange, indeed, how many Princes and Princesses originated; for nothing can be more false and unfounded. A lately dined with a gentleman, a gentleman who, short time since, spent a week at Babelsberg in attendance upon the young Prince and offered what he was in an either case to say, he says nothing can be more evident or more charming than the bearing of the Princess Frederick Pair. My informant dined every day for a week, and made several excursions with the Prince and Princess Frederick William, and was struck at the heart of the latter (and which, at the age of seventeen, is not likely to be counterfeit) as something very much resembling a love-affair between this, their stories to the contrary were so reiterated and so circumstantial as to leave no doubt. There was some coloring of truth in them; but so numerous were the anecdotes recited to me in proof of this pretended affair in the matter, that I can no longer feel any doubt but that this eldest darling of the good Queen Victoria is as free as air and as heart of the latter (and which, at the age of seventeen, is not likely to be counterfeit) as something very much resembling a love-affair between this Princess Frederick William of Prussia.



The contemplated marriage of Mlle. Mocquard was full of another recent marriage between a very different sort of couple. It is that which the timely death of the Comte Walewski has just made known to the contract with a young lady who, though of good birth and connections, has been reduced to the most gradid hereof by losing his concubine. They were married at Grimbilzi; and it is said the Governor have invited Lord Cardigan to be present (supposed) ignoring the presence of my Lady Cardigan; upon which her husband has written of this intelligence. Lord Cardigan wrote again to the Governor, and sent a fiery challenge purporting his readiness to meet him with pistols when and where he would appoint. I have not heard whether any answer was returned to this extraordinary letter; but it will be a more formidable affair than the fatal cavalry charge at Balaklava in which Lord Cardigan undertook to fight all those who will not receive my lady. But it is well that circumstances have altered this grand old man's ideas of the duello, and the conspicuous position of the parties made it to glaring and so dreadful.

CHESS CHRONICLE.

BY C. H. STANLEY.



TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"GIBBEL."—In giving place to your beautiful Chess strategem below printed, we congratulate you as being the author of the finest Chess composition to which we have ever seen. It is well adapted to come next in succession to Jaenisch's "Cunning Bishop" problem. If we are quite right, the mass of communications with which we have invited Chess Players to favor us with new attention to such as we could work with. C. H. S. thanks the many correspondents who have responded to his request (1.847) as a subtle-vice.—Solutions to various Problems have been received from "Constant Reader," "Jessamine" (Glenville, Ala.), A. C. W., E. G., Geo. A. E., A. B., and "Ajax." We shall be glad to receive some few others; but although several of them as to the Problem in No. 1 are correct, we are not sure than three complete solutions have yet received us.—"Constant Reader," "Jessamine," "Ajax," "Constant" and "Nanno" are right throughout each variation. Mr. Jessamine's solution of No. 2 is correct in all instances.—J. S. (East Orange, Del.). Any elementary book with out purpose that the present. The early Chess Player's Companion can be very well learned from books.——C. H. A. (Madison, Ga.), also W. H. E. (Mobile), and others. Your solutions are right but we do not find it practicable to spare time for pressing and forwarding the back numbers of the New York Chess. The best way, we think, would be for our friends to address a letter to the publisher of the New York Chess Club, 834 Broadway.——G. Always glad to hear from you. Your Problem is on file for early attention as also those of "Jacques." "T. Stroud," Dr. K., "Processular," J. R., H. F. R. (Philadelphia), F. W., Jun. (Syracuse), J. P. M., H. F. M. (Boston), R. R. M. (Va.), F. H. M.——One word, by-the-way, to our contributors in general. We had rather not receive more than one problem at a time from any one party, as we would prefer that a second be not sent until the first may have been published or rejected. Two problems at several cases, as many as six from one party. We would suggest that the amount of work designated in six would have been better employed if concentrated upon one, two, or three problems. The examination of each Enigma question is unavoidably postponed this week, and will appear in our next number.——In the New Chess Club, MASS. Both letters received—reply next week.——C. U. T. (Brooklyn). The old gem to which you refer were reprinted long, long ago. There is but one Chess Player in Jerusalem, and that is very clearly defined in all modern works. It can be effected only under the following circumstances: Provided that neither King nor Rook has been previously moved; that the King's Rook is struck at the time of intended castling; and that he does not pass over, in such act, a square commanded by an adverse piece; also that no piece be between the King's and Rook's squares. The method of castling, then, is, move the King two squares toward the Rook, and place the Rook on the square next to the King on the other side whence the Rook started. Thus, if K. to Q. (2nd or 3rd.). A player can not be compelled to move a piece touched, if by so doing he would leave his King in check. The only penalty you can enforce is to make him move his King.

THE TELEGRAPHIC MATCH between New York and London.—Hostilities between the belligerents in this case are for the present suspended. We are inclined to believe that both parties are somewhat surprised at find the length of time likely to be consumed in its conclusion. The London players have taken their places to which to accomplish a dream game, renders it by no means improbable that many or thirty would be found necessary to place either in advance by even a single move.

CHESS IN EUROPE.—But little matter of interest appears to have transpired since our last notice in Europe Atlantic Chess. One fact we resent with a sort of pleasurable regret, which is, that we are not likely to receive Mr. Morphy's reply to his sultry country so soon as was anticipated. He will probably pass the winter in Paris, which will give him the opportunity of encountering Herr Anderssen, one of the few great players that he has not already met, and—but no matter.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

BARNEY WHITE, of the Green River country, or Kentuckians express it, was one of those rare men of whimsy every-country something like him, but not identical. Big emotions, irrepressible humor, and rough, ill-constructed intellectual machinery, were the chief ingredients of this singular man. One day he and a friend were discussing the fact that the Kentucky River was lower than ever. "It will all his rainy enough, big sledge-hammer logic in the following animated appeal: "Barney," says he, "what is a river?" "Why, you fool, what's the issue when it's brought to a test is, Perhaps you'd throw it down and dry it over a stove, and have an everlasting pow-fo-de-ee, so that is an end of it. I'll be hanged if I know what it is."

The oldest piece of furniture is the multiplication-table. It was constructed more than two thousand years ago, and is yet in good preservation.

Stanton S. Coffy, of Rural County, Kentucky, is an illustration of the consequences of my debut in the legislature, and constantly swollen with big notions of his superiority, and, consequently, of his dignity, after delivering his prairie scuffer into the cultivated fields of his neighbors, he was accustomed to commit some such freaks of which the following is but one out of a thousand. Legislating in Frankfort, on the 10th of July, he said: "I tear down on Cumberland River t'other day, an' 'rected it was a Sunday, an' I stopped at Lafayette Hall; an' it kept getting cooler and cooler, an' when I got outside Mr. Crenshaw's house it was a little cooler (and I swore) an' I cut down an' went into the house, an' found a lot of people there waitin' for Mr. Crenshaw to preach a funeral sermon."

Henry the Eighth, after the death of Jane Seymour, had some difficulty to get another wife. His first offer was to the Duke of Milan; but the answer was—"I have had but one head; if she had two, one should have been at his service."

The following notice was posted up in the County of Kent, Delaware, in the year 1811, by the Magistrates of London on account of the lawlessness of the harvest-men: "Resolved, himself nor any of his tenants till the 10th of September."

An alderman having given courteously fat while in the Court of Queen's Bench, "Widened at the expense of the Corporation."

The following "pair" of Josephine's books was published in Philadelphia in the year of the first century, and has a slight resemblance to some of the book and patent medicine "mills" of the present day:

"King Arthur to Josephine, his dear friend, sendeth greeting. I have read over the book still great pleasure; and it appears to me that there least done it much more accurately, and with greater care, than the other writers who have made out of those books. Farewell, dear friend."—Life of Florent Josephus, 4to.

Aunt Betsy has sold many good things, among the rest, that a woman is like a will, because every man should have one of his own.

At Cairo, on Cumberland River, in Tennessee, an old man, James Brown, was presided before the Mayor, on which was addressed as follows:

"Jeems Brown, you are fined five dollars for the fuss in your lick."

"What fuss?"

All the fuss I'm-ble-s. (Obliv-ious-ness.

"Five dollars."

DIVETAR de bis patiendi.—"Hem! very odd! I must have made some mistake; there's nothing the matter with his tooth. Never mind, I'll try again. Of course, that's where you've pointed more than one of them, no matter how many I take out!"

A young lad recently ran away from home and went to sea. On his return he was kindly by a friend with a cigar in his mouth.

"What made you leave home?" said his friend.

"Father and mother were so annoyed," said he, "I couldn't stand it any longer, and so I went to sea."

Says an astronomer to a bright-eyed girl, when talking of meteors, etc., "Did you ever see a comet here, Miss?"

"I have seen many by reputation, but I have all yet seen," was the reply.

Passing by our court-house, a few days ago, my attention was attracted by the following notice, which is certainly wise or otherwise:

NOTICE.

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

I this day come to the determination to notify all persons not to trade with Sary P. Jonson while the execution of my bargain is in her hands, as the contract, I will be my house with and may case or providence. She has got my property and I have got her'n, and any person of the right size contracts on my property will be shot.

August 10, 1858.

SOPHIA JOHNSON.

In the southern part of Kentucky, the winter after the Presidential election of 1856, reports of the insurrection of the negroes, and incendiary fires, and, in some cases, great fast armed parties scoured the country, and Vigilance Committees were formed in many places, before which all suspected negroes were brought, and lawfully tried by a jury of their peers. Their fate was generally a terrible one.

The Committee in Hopkinsville had before them an old Negro named Bird, and the chairman, who was a noted old line Whig, and more noted for his eccentricities than for his legal acumen, addressed the prisoner:

"Bird, you know what you are here for; and we wish you to tell us the truth. Have you been guilty of this insurrection?"

"Well, sah," answered Bird, energetically, "I been Whig all my life, and Whig yet; I bet my money on the Whig ticket all the time; I had electors, and Clay and the other white folks what told me to bet it ought to reckon I'm a Whig. That's all I know about the insurrection."

A man of laughter followed: and Bird's entire ignorance and indolence were substituted to by a unanimous discharge.

"I was lately traveling," writes a correspondent, down the Green River, "when I overtook a man who the following colloquy occurred, at the top of their voices, between us, in spite of the attempts of the coachmen on the shore:

"'Hallo, Jackson! what will you charge to take me and my two horses and wagon and my wife and two children across the river?'

"Five dollars each for you and your wife and the children, and the ordinary space for the horses, and five dollars for the wagon.'

"'Too much, by Captain; it's too much. But—hallo, Jackson! will you trust 'Til do. I'll go if you throw the children in?'"

A Miss, whose one year at a boarding-school has only tended to make her more of a fool than she was before, being fondness for polysyllabic words, lately addressed a boy who was about to take a seat in a railway shed already quite crowded, "Oh, my dear Miss B——, how can you be so inelegant as to incommode your companions in that manner?"

"Do you think your classe is healthy, Bob?"

"Yes, I do."

"Then what's the way they isn't."

"I don't care what some folks say; but I never knew a new cash to complain of being out of health."

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRIDAY, P. M., December 3, 1858.

The foreign import trade for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports	Exports.
Week ending Dec. 4, 1858	$1,200,141	$1,017,529
Corresponding week, 1857	2,700,141	1,318,918
Increase	$1,500,000	$301,389
Decrease		$301,389

The above is a remarkable exhibit. Money is without change; it may be quoted, as before, at 6 per cent. for call loans. Commercial paper is offered at ninety days paper, 4 @ 5 per cent.; first-class, single name, 5 per cent.; first-class, double name, 6 per cent.; over which rate according to quality. Exchange on Europe is higher again, and the selling (bankers') at 109 @ 109¼ commercial, 108½ @ 109; francs 5.15 @ 17½.

In stocks there is nothing to report. The Stock Market is in a state of stagnation, without great fluctuation in prices, and without interest. Hard coal has appreciated 4 Wall Street have the whole field to themselves, and are buying and selling on their account without much profit or loss.

THE NEW YORK SPECTATOR FOR 1859.

THE NEW YORK SPECTATOR is the pioneer of American Literature. Its weekly issue, having been established thirty-two years. It is unsurpassed by any of its contemporaries in the value and variety of its contents, having attained its present popularity by its prompt adoption of every improvement and the infusion of manly taste and talent into its columns.

THE NEW YORK SPECTATOR has no superior as a SUNDAY NEWSPAPER, of Record and Literature. Its issue of MONDAY and TUESDAY, will contain a full and correct Report of Foreign News up to the very hour of going to press, including Full Reports of the Markets of this City, Boston, and neighboring cities; Editorials; Correspondence and Miscellaneous Reports from Washington, Albany, Sacramento, both State and National; A Correspondence of unusual merit from Paris, and other Foreign Correspondence; The Latest Telegraphic Despatches received by the Associated Press; All interesting Reports from Court, Bank Note Table, and ample daily reports of every kind, including Sporting and Commercial News.

THE WEEKLY EDITION

of the NEW YORK SPECTATOR will be carefully reedited, and contain the most important matter published in the columns, so that it shall be a safe as well as an entertaining and instructive family newspaper. Its editorial columns are written under a deep sense of responsibility. Its Notices of New Books are fearlessly and liberal and honest; its Agricultural Intelligence is compiled by a competent practical farmer, while its Tales, Sketches, and Literary Gleanings are customarily of a very high order, and are always selected with a view to combine high-toned and pure morality.

THE WEEKLY EDITION OF THE NEW YORK SPECTATOR is still worthy to be the aim of the proprietors to maintain, and they enter upon a new year with a determined purpose to make it the best of any heretofore conducted, and to make the SPECTATOR worthy of the wide and increasing patronage it receives.

OPENING ANNOUNCEMENT.

J. GURNEY'S
NEW PHOTOGRAPHIC AND FINE ART GALLERY,
No. 707 Broadway, first block below New York Hotel.

In announcing the opening of a new Photographic and Fine Art Gallery, Mr. GURNEY desires to call the attention of the public to a few facts:

That he is the oldest established Daguerreotypist in the United States.

That his rooms were first opened in the year 1840, at a time when the art was in its infancy, and questions as to the existence of any other establishment now in existence; and that during a period of eighteen years he has devoted his entire attention to the perfection of the Photographic Art, and has advanced from time to time large sums of money to assist others in demonstrating their supposed discoveries.

That he has spared neither time nor expense in accomplishing this design, and now, thanks to the correct judgment of an appreciative community, he can truthfully say that he has succeeded beyond his most sanguine expectations.

In order to keep pace with the improvements of the age, and retaining every convenience to his patrons, he has, at great expense, fitted up a new establishment, which, he believes, in elegance and convenience, surpasses any other in the world, occupying the new white marble building, No. 707 Broadway, built expressly to accommodate his increasing business, and for the further improvement of the Photographic Art.

Leading through the

RECEPTION ROOM,

on the first floor, you ascend one flight of stairs to the

EXHIBITION GALLERY,

containing a large collection of Photographs, finished in every style and of every size, which are those of some of the most distinguished and celebrated persons of the day.

In order to render the Gallery as attractive as possible, Mr. GURNEY has adorned one entire wall with the productions of some of the best American and foreign landscape painters.

DAGUERREOTYPE OPERATING ROOMS.

These have been arranged under the personal supervision of Mr. GURNEY, on an entire new principle, combining all that is necessary to make this department perfect.

PHOTOGRAPH OPERATING ROOMS.

This portion of the establishment has also been under the direct control of Mr. GURNEY, who was the first to introduce the new styles and improvements in Photography. Of course there may be many imitators in the field, but there are "none on the wing of every ensuing discovery, look to" GURNEY merely refers to his patrons for evidence of what especially ever those of any others.

ALIGHT STUDIOS OF OIL PAINTINGS.

This is the highest branch of all, where artists of the first distinction labor for the perfection of art; where, day after day, the portraits of some fortune is set forth to perpetuate fading beauty. It may be safely stated, that these pictures will compare with the productions of the best European Artists.

PASTEL STUDIO.

This is the studio where the unfinished Photograph receives its life-like colors, and where, by the most delicate process, the picture increases in correctness and beauty of tone, until the shade of the cheek, giving life in water colors, let the stick of hardened pencil assert a truth, and requires the most pencilling. It is an interesting process, and one which will repay a visit.

Besides these departments, there are many others devoted to the minor branches of the business, such as preparing plates, which requires a thorough knowledge of the principle of daguerreotyping.

The particular styles of pictures which Mr. GURNEY is now producing are as follows:

PHOTOGRAPHS,
From Miniature to Life size, finished in Oil, Pastel, Water Colors, India Ink and Crayon, by a corps of talented Artists.

IVORINES,
Retouched and Plain Finish.

MINIATURES IN OIL,
For beauty, delicacy, and finish, are unequaled.

DAGUERREOTYPES,
In the usual artistic styles.

N. B.—The Daguerreotypes of deceased persons can be copied by the Photographic process, enlarged to any size and colored in any style equal to those made from life.

The largest collection of Photographs of Statesmen, Divines, Poets, Literary and Military men to be seen in the world. Also, an exhibition, the largest collection of testimonials ever awarded any artist for Photographic productions.

PERFECT SATISFACTION GUARANTEED.

Gallery open till 10 P.M., for the free inspection of the public.

Mr. J. GURNEY, having thus furnished his patrons to the public, desires their approval for the success of his new establishment. Upon the foundation of that plinth he expects to still further elevate the standard of Photography and its various branches. Combining all the imitative arts in his Gallery, with perfection of finish, delicacy of touch and a subdued softness incomparable in its texture, he believes he can safely challenge the rivalship of any other establishment.

OUR SPECIAL EUROPEAN CORRESPONDENCE.

CHATEAU DE W——, November, 1858.

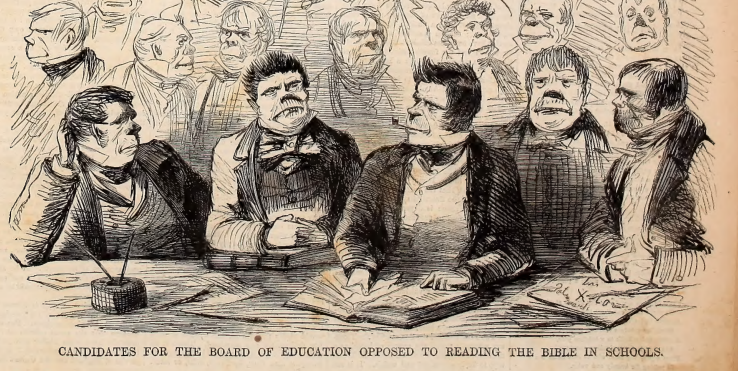
I AM among the chateaux, and happy to be so in this cold November weather, for they are well warmed by calorifères in the passages and sparkling wood fires in the chimneys; and the long evenings are agreeably spent in this choice and intimate society. Time enough by-and-by for Paris theatres and Paris soirées. The Emperor remains in his Chateau of Compiegne until the end of the month. Why should I not follow this illustrious example and remain here?



I accompanied my hosts, the other day, to a dinner at the Duke de M——'s. The party was not large—only some of their country neighbors, but among them were some of the most polished and agreeable persons of Paris society. The absence of all Imperialists allowed recent political events to be discussed with more freedom than would have been courteous under other circumstances. Portugal and the affair of the Charles-George, and the spirited and sensible letter which the Emperor has addressed to Prince Napoleon upon the subject of this free negro emigration, which, it is evident, was as little free as possible—these, and, above all, the prosecution of Monsieur Montalembert, were discussed upon with that indescribable tone and wit, and at the same time shrewdness, which give such a charm to French conversation, very much degenerated, as I suppose it is, since its palmy days of fifty or sixty years ago, but still, thanks to the readiness with which their language aids their talent, by far the most perfect of colloquial exhibitions. It is said the Emperor is in a devout mood, and has made this manifestation of his horror of the slave-trade as a set-off against his unwillingness to interfere in the New Mortara case against the decision of Pope and cardinals. As for Count Montalembert, I think England and the English are so disliked by all parties in France that he would have met with more sympathy if he was to be tried for abusing rather than for praising their faithful allies. The Emperor is supposed not to have wished to notice this publication, but to have been urged on to do so by his ministers. I doubt this. The prosecution seems to me quite in harmony with all Louis Napoleon's political acts—that absolute and bold repression, without regard to consequences, of all offences and insults, more or less disguised, emanating from the press, and directed against his rule and government. He said it should be so in the beginning of his assumption of supreme authority, and he has kept his word.

Have you noticed, lately, some impertinent remarks in one of the Paris newspapers in regard to America and Americans? I think they are rather indicuant on this side of the Atlantic at our having promised to measure ourselves with European diplomatists and secure a prize treaty with China and Japan. Then, too, the French dislike the idea of sympathy and a good understanding existing between the English and the Americans. In the first place, they can not understand it, for they consider them natural enemies; and as all Frenchmen think we should never have been a nation but for their potent aid and gracious permission, they think it ungrateful of us to oppose their policy or ideas in any way. I am not sorry to see the feeling springing up in France about Americans, particularly if it could tend to make the latter more regarded than they have hitherto been of the only bond which must ever unite them with the English—they being the sole possessors of liberty and its institutions—those rights which make men, in the true sense of the word, of the English and their descendants—and which circumstance, if the will of the two nations were united, and their material resources combined, would not only make them a bulwark against all aggression, but the dictators and regenerators of the world. You will perhaps think I am unjust in claiming for ourselves and cousins the sole possession of freedom, since Sardinia bravely holds on her way, and Prussia has changed her course, and the vessel promises to nobly obey her helm; and there are other symptoms in other lands. I grant there is hope in all this; but as I have not space here to unfold my thought, I must content myself with repeating my belief that England and America are the only countries where true liberty exists.

You probably know what a vieux garçon," as they are commonly called, is, but for such of your readers as do not I will describe them. It is a printed notice, sent to one's acquaintances in France, of the events in the family, of births, marriages, and deaths, and calling upon you to rejoice or to mourn with them accordingly. Among a number of such pagers sent to me here to-day by my concierge is one which has so touched and saddened me (I mean an ordinary notice) that I am tempted to transcribe it for you and them, to give you the little I know of the history of the young creature whose early death it announces:

"Monsieur Joseph Dunon and Mademoiselle Adèle Dunon inform you of the death of Mademoiselle Marie Dunon, their grand-daughter and sister, who died at Paris the 28th of October, 1858, aged twenty-one years. Pray for her soul."

Opposite to the apartment I have occupied for several years in the Rue de ——, at Paris, is the rather humble shop of a modiste and lingère. It has changed hands lately; but five or six years ago it was occupied by a coarse-looking woman of unprepossessing mien and repulsive countenance, named Michel, and who was assisted in her business by a young girl, as extraordinary contrast to herself, and whom every one remarked for her gentle, subdued air, and pretty face and form. She was called the niece of the woman Michel, who, by-the-way, had a bad reputation in the quarter, and was said to be harsh and exacting toward Marie and her younger sister Adèle, who also worked in the shop. A bachelor should not be supposed to have much to do with modistes, but I had often little matters to arrange and commissions to execute, in which I asked counsel and aid from my neighbors, to whom I became very well known. It was a pleasure to me, when returning from my club before dinner, to see, through the lighted window of the shop, Marie diligently plying her needle, with her little sister Adèle, who had not "her fatal gift of beauty," sitting as close to her as she could, or in the summer evenings, to see them in the door-way of their little shop, their arms round each other's waists, and breathing such air as the narrow street afforded. The woman Michel never left them until they were locked up in their little entresol bedroom at night, and then she always went out until a late hour, presided to one of the minor theatres. On Sundays, after mass, she took the girls to a distant part of Paris, to visit their only remaining parent—their paternal grandfather. This was their only recreation; and sometimes, if it rained, they were deprived of this. It was from this cause that I had made the acquaintance of Joseph Dunon. One evening I went into the shop to inquire about some ochre they had in hand for me. Madame Michel at the moment was in the back shop, and, from the sound, engaged in cooking their supper, when Marie said to me, "Monsieur is so good. I am very uneasy about grandpapa.

CANDIDATES FOR THE BOARD OF EDUCATION OPPOSED TO READING THE BIBLE IN SCHOOLS.

It rained on Sunday, and we could not go to see him, and when that happens he generally manages to send us a message; but this is Thursday, and we have heard nothing. He is so very old!" and the tears stood in Marie's beautiful eyes. "I will go and see about him to-morrow," I said. She quickly gave me the address, almost in a whisper, as Madame Michel looked suspiciously in at the door. Five or six months after this I saw, on two or three occasions, a gentleman, very stately, small, with a gray-headed, confidential-looking man-servant in earnest conference with Madame Michel. Marie had left them in the shop; and one evening I noticed her there, evidently weeping, though her face was turned from the window, and I felt she was in trouble. I was called away about this time for a short interval, and on returning I perceived I was neither Marie nor Adèle in the shop. I did not like to attract notice to my acquaintance, so I simply bought a bun, so I was obliged to wait, but I was not sorry; but when I went in that night to my concierge's lodge for my bed-candle she burst out to me:

"Pretty doings we have had here in Monsieur's absence. Marie Dunon has been off to the Préfecture de police for ten thousand francs. I saw her with my own eyes last Thursday morning at five o'clock, looking bilarity, and about half-past nine a carriage by that old man-servant's door, with two men, and Marie and Adèle in their bonnets and shawls, and the old man's trunk on the roof. I went to the street, to speak to her sometimes for my sake,' and the carriage drove off."

I was indignant at this recital. I could not sleep all night; and I determined to start next morning to go to the gratuitous, and take a day in my efforts to remedy this foul crime. Accordingly we found me knocking at old Dunon's room door, of five pair of stairs. I found him sitting in a comfortable arm-chair, a warm fire in the chimney, coffee, and very fragrant tobacco smoking upon the table for his breakfast, and he walked upon by the little darling of his existence, —all of which, he told me with exultation after the first salutations were passed, he owed to the love and care of his little Marie, who was quite a good marriage, and gone to live at Strasbourg, having placed her sister at school, and settled a good weekly sum upon him. He was afraid, he said, that he was too old to hope to see her again, and he should miss the sight of her pretty face; but she was happy, and it was well for her, and he must be content. Could I guess who the old man? and what good would it effect? No; I came away leaving him in his delusion, and the next day I had these lines from Marie:

"MONSIEUR,—Do not undeceive grandpapa or my sister, who think I am happily married. I have been sold, but to an old man, Monsieur, and perhaps the holy Mother of God will listen to my prayer, and that I shall not live very long.

"MARIE."

Four years have passed since then. I have sometimes seen Marie Dunon in the dusk of a summer's evening, being whirled to the Bois de Boulogne by the side of a well-known Paris voluptuary. Sometimes I have caught a glimpse of her sweet and always sad face in a closed box at the opera or theatre, and in company with the same individual. Twice I have met her at German watering-places, and always with the same well-known Count de ——. The last time was this summer at Baden-Baden, and I thought I remarked then that her Cashmere was wrapped more closely around her in the evening promenade, and that her cheeks were whiter and paler, but I never thought of death until I received this "Faire Part."

Adieu. L.

IN THE STREETS.

I.

On sing, if you please, of the waving trees,
Of the sunshine and the showers!
Though it may be health, and it may be wealth,
Yet work is very charming.
I hate the formal grove, where the people can stare
At your clothes by the light of the morning,
I like the night best, when the fools are at rest,
And I'm all at the liberal dawning.

II.

Oh sing, if you will, of the musical fill,
Of the meadow and the mountain!
But the spot for my feet is the stone-clad street
And my music the old Park fountain.
When the night comes down on the glorious town,
Without a thought on the weather,
As bold as a hawk I start on my walk
With a heart like a dancing-bird's feather.

III.

The night hath a spell that answers me well,
It puts me all on a level:
If my clothes do not suit, or the holes in my boot,
Why, the critic can go to the ——.
For why should I care in the street and the air
Are as free to me as to any,
The millionaire bold, with his jewels and gold,
Or the wretch who has never a penny.

IV.

There is many a sight on the streets at night
To make the blood thrill the faster,
An oath and a blow for the fallen low,
From her grandsire lord and master;
A curse and a knife to a helpless wife,
And a kick for a pleading daughter,
From a jolly big man, who as loud as he can
Is yelling for brandy and water.

V.

It is capital fun, when the fighting is done,
To see him go into the grocery;
And the bar-keeper come, with his poisonous rum,
And admiringly brush off his raggery.
I admire it so, I invariably go
To speak to the wife broken-hearted,
In exchange for her frown I pay to the bar-keeper
That "last spirit" and the brute should live parted.

VI.

And the street is the place for an omnibus race,
If the driver has only been drinking—
The chances are strong for a capital song,
He will catch some old fellow unlooking;
And then what a joke to see the old boy broke,
For the life he can not take a target!
But the driver can't stay, as the horses away,
And reads it next day in the paper.

VII.

I have a taste for a wrap-like waist,
For a beautiful foot in a gaiter,
So I go by night, when the gas shines bright,
To the opera, or Niblo's, or Astor.
Then beauties I see, though they can not see me
Through the glass of my opera-lorgnette,
I enjoy all the show, and at quietly go
And rejoice with myself on the saving.

VIII.

But of all the delights that I drink in of nights
A well-kinded fire is positive;
'Tis peculiarly fine to see the light shine,
And I can not help getting specurious;
Ah, then for the fun of the crackling coal!
And the bells, how they shout in the chorus!
For I pull and I tug at the gas plug,
Lest Forty gets water before us!

IX.

In the street and the muse it is splendid to go
And stand near the blaze till the morrow,
To get thoroughly wet in the midst of the storm,
And watch its last glimmer to sorrow.
Then off all the delights that I wish for of nights
The rank of the highest I borrow:
'Tis a music most dear to the listening ear
Of the shivering watcher and waiter.

X.

You may sing, if you please, of the perfumed breeze
That floats over hill-side and heather;
The country may do, with its flowers, for you,
But the town is the singer for rather.
But the town, like a bride that is decked in her pride,
Shall blossom and bloom forever;
Through every fair season shall look gay,
And the flowers shall fade on them never.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1858.

THE NATIONAL FINANCES.

EIGHTEEN months ago the public debt of the United States but slightly exceeded twenty-five millions of dollars. Now it exceeds fifty-four millions, and it is abundantly evident that before we are a year older it will exceed sixty millions.

This is not the fault of the Government, or of the public policy of the country. There have been, within the past two years, no unusual and extravagant appropriations. There were, no enormous outlays for unproductive works of internal improvement. On the contrary, the public expenditures have been less profuse than usual; many wholesome projects have been postponed for the sake of economy; just completed capital forts have been left unarmed unredressed; several branches of the public service have been less efficient than they might have been had the finances in charge of them been remunerated with a less niggardly hand. The financial embarrassment in which the United States happens to be placed arises from no fault of the Administration. It springs simply from a failure of income.

The United States derive the bulk of their income from two sources—the sales of public lands and customs duties on foreign imports. Unlike other civilized nations, they levy no direct taxes on their citizens, impose no pecuniary tolls on industry, locomotion, industry, or agriculture. The receipts from customs are to those from public lands as 10 to 1, or, some years, as 15 to 1. It is, in fact, he said, in general terms, that the customs represent a fair back-bone of the financial system of the country. This revenue is dependent on the consumption of foreign products by the people of the United States. When they are poor and minded to economize, the consumption but a small quantity of foreign dutiable goods, and the income from customs falls off; when they are rich and feel like being extravagant, the consumption of foreign goods increases, and the customs revenue is augmented in proportion. The first consequence of the revulsion of 1857 was to impel people of every class to retrench their expenditures; it was this retrenchment which reduced the public income and placed the nation in the attitude of a borrower.

The President and the Secretary of the Treasury naturally regarded the issue of bonds as a means of supplying the deficiency in the Treasury, to be inconvenient and unfair. It is not right that, in time of peace, we should throw upon future generations the burden of supporting the government of the present day. They therefore recommend an increase of duties on certain imports, in order to swell the customs revenue to an adequate figure.

It is very doubtful whether this expedient would attain the end proposed. The imposition of a duty on iron would, for instance, largely stimulate home production; and as the country is not likely to be a large purchaser of railroad iron for some time to come, it is quite possible that a material increase in the duty might operate simply as a check on importation. So with other articles. The feeling of the people, just now, is to economize. If Congress contributes to the success of this or that foreign fabric or commodity by means of a new tariff, it is quite possible that the public may dispense with its use. Hence, till this year, we article regarded as so generally indispensable as tea; yet, as we showed the other day, since the revulsion the people of the United States have almost altogether dispensed with it, and have drunk coffee, in many instances, without sugar. It is quite essential, therefore, whether an increase of duties would necessarily produce an increase of revenue.

Apart from this consideration, the plan of depending on fluctuating tariffs for a public income is, theoretically and practically, open to grave criticism. It is only a few years since the gravest evils were introduced into the government by the superabundance of revenue; it were only fair to say that the tariff was arranged expressly in order to reduce the public income. Now it is proposed to increase the duties again. If, next year, the revenue, and importations recommence on the old standard, in 1859 Congress will again be called upon to reduce the duties. Thus the tariff of the United States will be perpetually changing, commercial calculations will be eternally liable to defeat from Congressional movements, and the public revenue will oscillate regularly between injurious plethora and impending bankruptcy. Surely this is not the financial system which ought to prevail.

There is no reason why at once an experiment should not be made to establish a system of direct taxation. There is no city or county in the United States which is not taxed directly for municipal, county, or State purposes. A federal tax would be understood at once; would be paid without flinching; and might be collected without inconvenience. If it were found to work well the whole system of customs duties might be abolished, and injury to trade, one, and with a manifest advantage to the commerce of the country. Who will take the lead in pressing these views on the attention of Congress?

SHALL POSTAGE BE INCREASED?

WHAT the Government fixed the rate of postage at thirty years ago, respective of distance, and obliged letter-writers to pay the postage in advance, quiet people, ignorant of politics, felt satisfied that "all right" had been reached, and that they would hear no move of the postal system. It seems, from Mr. Brown's report, that we are not quite so well off as most of the nations as ever, and that some new and startling change is impending. The Secretary himself recommends the adoption of a uniform five-cent rate in lieu of the present three-cent one.

It is needless to say that this proposal will meet with no favor either from the public or from Congress. The luxury of cheap postage has been too thoroughly relished to be now abandoned without a severe struggle. It is contrary to all experience to retrograde in such a matter. We may have a two-cent rate; but never a rate over three cents.

Yet it is unreasonable to expect the people of Texas to pay postage to four millions a year, as they are now doing, for the support of the Post-office. It is not fair that the people of New York, Massachusetts, Virginia, and Ohio should be taxed to this extent for the support of unproductive mail routes in thinly-settled portions of the country.

A large item might be deducted from the Post-office expenditure were a little common sense exercised in the progress in the regulation of the franking and ocean mail systems. There is no reason why thousands of dollars should be paid out every year—as is the case at present —for the dissemination, under Congressional franks, of party political documents. If the party to be benefited by the circulation of these documents can not pay postage on them, let them stay where they are. It is monstrous to see the people called upon to pay for the transportation of the Hon. Jones's views on Kansas, or of the Hon. Smith's designs on Mexico. In the second place, the sums paid for ocean postage are out of all reason. We will not weary the reader by presenting the statistics of our ocean postage; but we are not exaggerating when we say that our ocean steamers receive from the Post-office Department, on an average, one thousand dollars, for a service which they would gladly perform for ten dollars, or even five dollars, for any merchant. There is no reason why the matter should cost more to transport than flour, hardware, silks, or laces.

It should be charged, like other merchandise, according to bulk and weight; and no more should be paid for it than a price for the freight of the most perishable and valuable kinds of merchandise. A very large proportion of the Post-office expenditure has grown out of the practice of voting, from corrupt motives, large subventions to ocean mail lines. If these two leaks were stopped the requirements of the Post-master-General on the Treasury would be greatly relieved.

For the rest, rather than raise the rate of postage, we would like to see the Post-office Department established altogether, and the business of carrying letters placed on the same footing as that of carrying freight and passengers. We apprehend that no difficulties would flow from a transfer of the Post-office business to the express companies. They would carry letters more expeditiously than the Government. They would be responsible for their safe delivery, which the Post-office is not. They would do it at a much more moderate charge. They would save the national Post-office, with its forty thousand hired servants, wiped out of existence, one of the most powerful sources of political corruption would disappear.

THE FILIBUSTERS IN NICARAGUA.

As was expected, a party of Walker's filibusters have effected a landing in Nicaragua, and are by this time on the soil or near the coast of Nicaragua. They will have to run the gauntlet of the land-and-sea-of-war of that State; but it is presumed that they know enough to evade capture by her Majesty's cruisers. Commodore Paulding is employed in more useful duty than arresting filibusters. So now the Nicaraguan question assumes a new phase.

Those who have known William Walker have never placed any reliance in the assurances of his enemies that his sun had set—that he had exhausted his luck in his Sonora connection with Nicaragua. Whatever the man's faults of heart or head may be, there is no doubt that his will is indomitable, his purpose fixed, and his energy very remarkable. During his late visit here he made no secret of his intention to land in the territories of Nicaragua; and considering every thing—the great courage of the man, the general sympathy the United States feels for his aim, and the political weakness of the United States Government, and the decided failure of the Nicaraguan efforts to reconstruct a native government, it would not be surprising if he kept his word. Five hundred Americans are quite capable of keeping Nicaragua in confusion. Already one hundred and eighty of them are either on the spot or near it; perhaps before this paper reaches the public eye the remainder will be there.

Without undertaking a defense of the filibuster principle, or of the conduct, or of William Walker in particular, we will say that as a restoration to supreme power in Nicaragua would be by no means an event prejudicial to the interests of commerce and civilization, the effort of Nicaragua there has been no such thing as order or good government there. Even the municipal government of the city of New York compares favorably with the late Hispano-native government of Nicaragua. One set of rogues has succeeded another, and has traded, like its predecessors, on the only valuable asset Nicaragua possesses—its one boon of—the transit route. It has been sold first to one, then to another; every body has been paid for it, no one has realized it to any of the purposes for which it has never been opened. The people of the country are described as living in less terror of the return of Walker than of their own Government inspires. Commerce, agriculture, production, and civilization are at a stand-still. Now is there any ground for fearing that this is a mere transitory state of things. Experience teaches that anarchy, disorder, and industrial and commercial stagnation are the normal condition of the Spanish-American nation in Nicaragua. So long as that magnificent country remains in the hands of its present possessors things can not improve.

Walker has made many mistakes. There was a time when the whole Nicaraguan world would have gladly recognized his authority as ruler of Nicaragua. He threw away the opportunity. He was not absolutely necessary to destroy himself in a war with the neighboring States; yet he did so, to his ruin. The transit route was essential to the prosperity of the country; yet he closed it. These mistakes have cost him all the vantage ground he once possessed.

It may be presumed that he has taught him wisdom, and that if fortune were again to set him over the head of Nicaragua he would neither quarrel with his neighbors, nor forfeit the esteem of foreign States, nor close the natural avenues of commerce. If he subjected a new policy in these respects, it can not be denied that the world at large would be a decided gainer by his restoration.

These speculations may, of course, be overthrown by the capture of his "emigrants" by British or American cruisers. But we should imagine that the naval officers of these two countries have some higher aim in life than the humiliation of petty policemen. If the naval service of England and the United States offer no nobler occupation than this, "Jack Tar" had better try his hand at some new trade.

MEXICO AND CUBA.

The President does not recommend instantaneous war on Mexico; he only advises a recourse to hostilities in the event of the permanent overthrow of the party of which Comonfort and Juarez are representatives, and the ultimate triumph of the Church faction. Should Zuloaga consolidate his empire, Mr. Buchanan holds that there exist adequate grounds for declaring war upon him. But as there appears to exist very little prospect of his subjugating the entire people of Mexico, the chance of hostilities seems distant enough.

Whatever differences of opinion may exist as to the wisdom of Mr. Buchanan's domestic policy, no sagacious observer can deny that his foreign policy is entitled to general approval. Though he has not succeeded in settling the Central American question; though France continues to exact differential duties from our ships; though Spain has made no reparation for the numerous outrages committed on United States vessels and American trade; though we have made worse terms with China than other nations; though our friendship with Russia has not been worth a dollar to us, and our regard for Germany has not availed to protect American citizens from being impressed to serve in German armies; still, there can be no question but Mr. Buchanan has done the best he could under the circumstances, and that American diplomacy stands as high as it did under Mr. Pierce's administration.

In point of fact our political relations with Europe amount to very little. They are at best questions of dollars. A few dollars more or less would settle all the pending questions between the United States and Spain and France. Great Britain is sincerely anxious to keep out of the pending imbroglio with regard to Central America. Germany only waits for a distinct expression of opinion from this country to respect the title of United States citizen. The really important foreign relations of the United States are those which concern the smaller States of this continent—Mexico and Cuba.

Let us hope that they are coming to a head. For forty years Mexico has been a scene of almost uniform and unvaried anarchy. Government has succeeded government without benefit to the people, without security to life or property, without safety for foreign commerce. The rule of the Church, of which Zuloaga is the pliant tool, is probably the worst that has been tried; for under it foreigners have been despoiled and imprisoned as ruthlessly as Mexicans, and petitions for redress have been treated with absolute contempt. If the President's recommendations are followed by suitable Congressional action—if Sonoro and Chihuahua are garrisoned by United States troops, and moral and material aid are granted to the Constitutional party in Mexico—it is possible that the final collapse of that republic may be delayed, or perhaps avoided altogether. If Congress refuses to abide by the policy of the Administration, the probability is that the country will be driven perforce into a war of conquest.

Again, as to Cuba. In the event of a war between the United States and a leading European Power, it would be essential to the United States to seize Cuba. This country does not propose to rob the Spaniards of the island; it offers to buy it. Spain will not sell: what is to be done? The President requests Congress to appropriate money enough to enable him to close a bargain in the event of Mr. Preston, the new minister, being able to conclude one. We shall see whether this request will be complied with. If it is not, look out for another Lopez.

THE LOUNGER.

"Lynn, November, 1858.

"My Dear Lounger,—I venture to address you, as a friend of the public and of poor suffering humanity, to ask of you a little advice.

"I am a young man in the mercantile profession, nearly twenty-one years of age, and of good family. I have been in my present business almost four years, but I can not say that I take much interest in it. My work, I know, is done with diligence and dispatch. But my progress in life does not keep pace with my desires or abilities. I earn scarcely enough to keep me in the indispensables of life.

"The grand wish of my life, the hope in which I have indulged for these many years, has been to earn my livelihood by my pen. But the reputation of 'writing for the papers' will not satisfy me.

"I know what you will say with regard to the trials and struggles of young authors. The tale of misery and woe, of abuse and neglect, has been too often told. I know that, in nearly every instance, a firm determination and resolve to conquer have been the secret of their success.

"What a joy must be that of the young author who, after years of patient labor, is at last enabled to bring the public mind to a just appreciation of his merits and works!

"I have read 'Lives of Great Men.' They 'all remind us' that energy and determination can be relied upon like true and steadfast friends. It cost them all their time and labor to make themselves noticed. I have plenty of ambition, but, I fear, not an equal amount of energy. But give me a path in which to travel, or, in homelier phrase, put me in the right track, I promise to march forward boldly and resolutely. And that, my dear Lounger, is what I humbly ask of you. Your advice, I know, is worth having. You may imagine the condition I am in. You have heard of similar cases, no doubt. And last, but not least, do not read my letter with contempt nor indifference.

"It is truly sincere. Placed in your situation you, no doubt, are often bored by long letters on all subjects and from all classes of people. I hope this will not bore you. Whether it does or not, it certainly will be the last annoyance I shall ever give you. Whatever may be the result of sending this sheet, my earnest endeavors to be something shall not be wanting, and, remembering the words of our Longfellow, shall still 'learn to labor and to wait.'

With great respect,

"Yours, D. G."

—The Lounger prints the whole of "D. G.'s" letter, as a specimen of so many anxious, restless, eager questions which every literary man receives, and which he ought to be willing fairly and patiently to answer. The Lounger has answered such before, but he gladly does it again, urging J. W., as well as D. G., to reflect seriously upon what he says.

"My progress in life does not keep pace with my desires or abilities." That it does not keep pace with your desires is very likely; but how do you know that it does not with your abilities? If you are able to go faster why do you not? What you mean, if you think of it closely, is it any thing more than that you think your abilities might achieve finer results? The probability is that you are wrong.

"*The grand wish of my life * * * has been to earn my livelihood by my pen.*" Is that because you have the instinct of genius, or is it merely a wish springing from vanity? If you want to prove it, write something; send it to a publisher if it be a book, to an editor if it be an article. Now of a thousand MSS. which publishers receive, they find about two hundred, say, worth considering at all. Of these they may publish fifty. Of these fifty books, ten may possibly yield the author a little sum, after long delay; and of the ten, one may make him a reputation. "D. G." has but to count the number of authors of any eminence at all in this country; calculate how many of them live by pure literature; and then think of the scores of MSS. that are read and refused every week. School-books, when they are fortunate and standard works, pay; and a lucky young author, who makes a hit, may also make some money by his hit—what are "D. G.'s" chances of being that one?

Suppose he writes a magazine article, and it is accepted, being the one out of fifty that is not thrown away. There are but three or four magazines in the country that pay contributors liberally. He might get fifty dollars for his article. He could hardly expect more than one to be accepted monthly, and he would get six hundred dollars a year. But to have his papers regularly accepted they must be uncommonly good, or else must seem to the editor full of promise of popularity. Is D. G. ready to supply that kind of article?

He may prefer the newspapers. Let him, then, before he relinquishes his present employment, come to New York and try his hand at getting engaged upon a newspaper. There are, at least, a hundred men waiting eagerly upon the spot for every vacancy that arises. Is he better qualified than they? Then he can not hope to be editor of a journal at once, even if he succeed in writing an occasional editorial. But to paragraph and report and write at large upon a newspaper would no more seem to him to suit his "abilities" than "the mercantile profession."

"A firm determination and resolve to conquer" (a literary aspirant must learn the meaning of the word tautology) "have been the secret of their success." No, that is not quite so. That does not explain Irving's success, nor Cooper's, nor Hawthorne's, nor Emerson's, nor Prescott's, nor Bancroft's. The first point in all these cases was the essential excellence of the work. And probably if they had done excellent literary works and the public had been unmoved, they would have turned to other excellent works and have done them. A dull man can "resolve" quite as stubbornly as a clever man. Success, indeed, is incalculable; but if it come, it is the reward of the cleverness, not of the dull resolve. Of course merit is not always successful; nor is success always evidence of merit. But it is always evidence of adaptation to a purpose. The Ledger is successful, because its conductor knows precisely what his great diocese want to read. But he might not chance to think D. G.'s or Walter Scott's stories pat to his purpose.

"Put me in the right track;" yes, but that is the very weakness of the whole thing. Give me a pou sto, cried Archimedes. But Shakespeare did not. He put himself in position. D. G. proposes to fight a battle, not to serve as a soldier. Now a General must decide for himself. He has nobody but himself, and wants nobody else, to fall back upon.

The Lounger is lengthening rapidly. But if D. G. really feels willing to risk all, if he be seriously willing to be pinched with hunger and sadly and doubtfully to snap at any kind of work that offers, let him come to New York and write wrappers, if he can do no better. The Lounger knows men in New York, at this moment, of the same literary aspirations, who would write wrappers—if only they could find them to write. From that, let D. G. calculate his chance of rising into "a hit." Don't read about Keats, and Dr. Johnson, and Goldsmith, and the noble host who have starved before succeeding, and suppose that if you only starve hard enough, you will at last succeed. If you have a good employment do not mistake your ennui, which is incident to every calling, as a prompting to desert it, or as a proof that you can do something else better. At least, begin your literature while you are sure of a dinner. See how it flourishes and promises. Let the world taste your peaches and find out if it wants them, before you plow up your whole estate into a peach orchard.

And do not misunderstand. "If God have called any of you to explore truth and beauty, be bold, be firm, be true." But, first of all, be sure that it is he who calls, and not your own vanity, indolence, ignorance, and conceit of ability. The dignity of human pursuits lies in the character of the workman. Old George Herbert sings, with quaint solemnity:

"Who sweeps a room, as by His laws,
Makes that and the action fine."

A merchant, or a merchant's clerk, may "live by his pen" quite as honorably as the poet or the historian.

Will D. G. and J. W., and many others, take what the Lounger says as kindly as he means it? If your object be "to make a hit," instead of to help somebody or something, you are merely inordinately vain. It is just as true in Literature as in morals, that whoever would find his life must lose it. If you adopt Literature for your own glorification, you may be very sure that God has not called you "to explore Truth and Beauty."

A WORD TO THE LADIES ONLY.

Mrs. Nancy Dobley presents her compliments to the Lounger, and begs through him to say a word to the ladies exclusively. Gentlemen are expected and invited to omit this paragraph, and skip to the next.

The word, dear fellow-ladies, has reference to the mud—to walking in the mud and slush—to crossing the streets in the mud and slush—and to keeping our garments unsoiled from the mud and slush.

Are we aware, ladies, that we have a habit, in these days, of lifting our skirts very high indeed when we cross the street?—that it is already remarked by gentlemen—and that to watch a well-dressed and careful woman wade across Broadway is a favorite occupation of men whose admiration is not flattering?

Mrs. Dobley has seen with pain some of her fellow-ladies apparently forgetting the great fact of hoops; forgetting that the hoop makes a great lift of a little lift. And if the skirt can not be lifted altogether from the mud and slush, why, in the name of Victoria R., shall we not all wear the Balmoral, and let that take its chances?

"OUR SPECIAL EUROPEAN CORRESPONDENCE."

In the Weekly for December 4 was published the first of a series of letters from Europe, to which the Lounger especially commends the readers of this paper. They are written by a person who "moves habitually in the highest society," whose European connections of many kinds are such as to secure a familiar acquaintance with people and aspects of life generally unknown altogether, or very unsatisfactorily reported; and the reader who trusts himself to this sagacious and agreeable companion will be sure of great amusement and instruction. Matters of public importance are so fully discussed in the newspapers, and foreign politics are such mere speculations to us, that special correspondents can illuminate them very little. But our new friend is to open to us private doors, and catch for us the fleeting hues of society, and to tell all those delightful details which reveal the form and pressure of contemporary life in the gayest country of the world.

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY.

One of the handsomest books that has ever come from the handsome-book-making hands of Ticknor & Fields is the "Life of Sir Philip Sidney," just published. It is most tastefully bound and most daintily tinted and most clearly printed. It is of pleasant size and convenient form. The head of the hero from the Lodge Portraits embellishes the front of the book, and a good picture of Penshurst, the seat of the Sidneys, of which Ben Jonson and Waller sing—and a fac-simile of Sir Philip's writing, satisfactorily help to complete the work.

This Life of Sidney is partly anonymous, only the initials of the author's name are given at the end of a singularly modest preface, and the dedication "To my son," does not betray the sex of the author. But for all that we see a woman's face in the cloud: and it shall not be counted among the least glories of this youth whom History and Literature have conspired to praise, that three hundred and four years after his birth, a woman in the interior of a distant country collects the facts of his life and weaves them into this simple and beautiful story.

Perhaps no man of so general a fame ever achieved less. The material for his biography is very slight. His friend and idolator Fulke Greville, Lord Brooke, wrote his Life, and the Sidney Papers contain several of his letters. The author of the present Life mentions some of the other sources of intelligence about him. Oldys, indeed, declares that he knew two hundred authors who had praised Sidney—and except Hazlitt and Horace Walpole, "none named him but to praise." But wherever the student comes upon Sidney, it is coming upon a track of light. A rare, symmetrical character, he wore some of the superficial conceits of his age, as a man dresses in the fashion of his time and land—but the substance of his character was Christian heroism. Sidney was a gentleman in old Dekkar's sense.

He was born in 1554. He went to Oxford; was in Paris during the slaughter of St. Bartholomew; traveled upon the Continent in Germany and Italy, partly with Hubert Lanquet; returned to England when he was twenty; was sent as embassador to Austria when he was twenty-one; became the friend of the great William of Orange; returned to England, and wrote the letter which dissuaded Elizabeth from marrying the French "Mounseer:" quarreled with Lord Oxford at Court, and when the Queen rather favored Oxford, withdrew to his sister's seat at Wilton ("Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother"), and wrote the "Arcadia;" chafed in idleness, and planned a trip to America; was the friend of Spenser and other literary men, Hakluyt having dedicated his first volume to him; and finally, after writing "The Defense of Poesy" and the "Sonnets," he was appointed by Elizabeth Governor of Flushing, went thither in November, 1585, and on the morning of the 22d September, 1586, was shot in a skirmish, lingered for twenty-six days, and died on the 19th of October.

That is the substance of his story. He was not the greatest among the great men with whom he lived, but there was none of them better or nobler than he. In all history there is no more graceful or heroic figure, no man for whom we have to make less allowance. The very brilliancy of his position sometimes half inclines an occasional reader to believe that his heroism was rather silken and perfumed than stern and simple. But no one who has studied his career faithfully but will find in him the same stuff of which his father, Sir Henry, and his nephew, Algernon, were made, and confess that history and the human heart are justified in loving him, both for what he was and for what he might have done.

The author of this "Life of Sidney" has brought together the facts with enthusiasm, and has done us all a service in putting his whole career within easy grasp. The Life by Dr. Zouch is in all stately libraries, but it is a cumbrous and unsatisfactory performance. The sketch prefixed to Lanquet's correspondence with Sidney is, upon the whole, the best of previous biographies, excepting, of course, the original of Fulke Greville.

The young men of America could propose to themselves no higher standard of true gentlemanly honor than the character of Sir Philip Sidney.

MORE CAISSA.

The mysteries of this goddess are many; and among the most profound the Lounger places the following letter:

"New York, December, 1858.

"Dear Lounger,—It grieves me to observe that, notwithstanding the high authority whence your information was derived, you have been led into error as to the derivation of the title of the goddess Caissa, before whose altar the army of chess-players bow and worship.

"My high respect for the authority which you quote (vide Lounger, December 4) would render me dumb, but that, being indebted to neither informant nor historian, I speak of facts within my own personal knowledge.

"The true origin of the term Caiss-a was in this wise:

"Many centuries ago, and long before the noble game was ever thought of, the supremacy of the chess-board was disputed by two well-known amateurs—William the Conqueror and Childe Harold. After long delay occurring, through the heavy literary engagements of the former player, they at length met in deadly conflict on the checkered field. The play on either side was of the highest order; and on the hundred and fifty-sixth move a position the most critical had ensued. At this period of the game William the Conqueror (playing the Black men) thus addressed his antagonist:

"'Ha, hah! by my faith I have thee now! Know then, my Bloomer, that thou art a Case!'

"'Sayst thou so, bold Boa-constrictor? Though Conqueror thou art called, I'd have thee know thou canst not come it o'er this Childe just so! I further tell thee that, this very day, Sir, if I'm a Case, 'tis thou that art a Caissa!'

"After a few more moves the game was won by White in handsome style.

"The terminating moves in the above partia resulted in a very pretty position, which, being fortunately present, I noted down. It forms a problem of much intricacy; its stipulations being: 'White to play, and checkmate in a pig's eye.' The game was contested at the new down town chess club, which was opened, free of charge, under the superintendence of Mr. C. H. Stanley, on Monday, at No. 149 Fulton Street.

"I am, dear Lounger,

"Yours faithfully,

"Checkmate."

THE MUSES IN BROOKLYN.

Our stately neighbor, Brooklyn, since it has discovered that it is the third city in the country, resolves to depend no longer upon its older sister for an occasional visit of the Muses. It proposes to domesticate them. It has, therefore, begun to agitate for an opera house: and that Painting may not linger behind Music, the artists resident in Brooklyn have organized the Graham Art School of the Brooklyn Institute, for Life-study and general improvement. The trustees of the Institute favor the project by warming and lighting a proper room for the purpose, and the meetings to be held on Monday and Friday commenced on Monday of this week. There are already twenty-five members, and Messrs. Charles Parsons, H. W. Herrick, B. F. Childs, and H. S. Beckwith were elected officers for the year.

May the Brooklyn Muses prosper!

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—"Wall Street" wants the Lounger to publish Hood's "famed Bridge of Sighs" in "the next week's edition." Wall Street must have patience. Milton's Paradise Lost, Shakespeare's works, and the ninety-three volumes of other British poets, have precedence on the file for insertion.

A CHARADE FOR FAST YOUNG LADIES, BY A SLOW YOUNG MAN.

I saw her at the opera,
Where next but one we sat,
And when she raised her opera-glass,
My First lay in her lap.
Ah, how divine she looked that night!
My eyes I ne'er removed,
Save once, when with a haughty glance
My Second she reproved.
Between the acts her father rose;
But ere he reached the door
He dropped my Third, of value great,
And left it on the floor.
My Fourth and last is, like my First,
For maidens fair alone;
For want of it at home, abroad,
They never can atone.
Against the wearing of my whole
Papas will make objection,
Causing thereby, to daughters fair,
Deep fits of low dejection.
But I with them must still confess,
Upon mature reflection,
That as a general thing it is
"A very great protection."
And now, young ladies, fast and fair,
These lines for your inspection
Can not, I think, expect escape
From full, complete detection.

GLIMPSES AT LIFE IN WASHINGTON,

OBTAINED THROUGH AN EYE-GLASS.

BY PAUL POLKAFOOT.

My hotel is Willard's. I go there somewhat as a matter of course, being to Washington. I arrive a day or so before the "assembled wisdom" of the nation gets together in that wonderfully-bedizened new gilt saloon yclept the Capitol, feat Captain Meigs. Because Willard's is, par excellence, the Northern hotel of Washington. To be sure the National is "kept" by a pair of enterprising Yankees, while I strongly suspect one Mrs. Willard to be absolutely a Virginian. Never mind that. As my young friend and pitcher, Fitz Alamode of New York, says, Willard's is the most noisy of all the Washington caravanseries, and generally contains the biggest lot of fools goe-urks. Besides, too, it is almost under the shadow of the White House, and it is even possible, of a clear morning, to get a sniff of the ravishing odors which arise in the aristocratic kitchens around Jackson Square.

I met my old friend and patron, General F——, in the Rotunda, looking as rotund as ever, and even more rosy about the gills. The General is a Southerner—an Honorable—owns a plantation, with lots of "niggers" thereunto appertaining; has a wife and babies (all at home, Mrs. General included); always has a good appetite for dinner, and, after a long and interesting series of experiments, has come to the conclusion that old Bourbon whisky, if unadulterated with water, is rather beneficial to health than otherwise. General F—— may, therefore, be considered as at the height of human felicity. His person confirms the truth of this observation.

"I've got some of the genuine old corn-juice in my room, Polkafoot," he said, looking at me kindly through his gold-bowed spectacles. "Come up to-night—room No. 4001—and if your palate hasn't been spoiled by drinking your thin Yankee potations during the recess, the first swallow will make you happy for a week. You want something of that sort, Polkafoot, to give a generous flow to your blood, and fat you up; 'gad, you're thin as a razor. You'll never make any thing, my boy, until you can get up a little more rotundity. Look at me now!"

The General glanced affectionately downward at the visible parts of his own ample person, and somewhat intrusively, I thought, advanced one of his stout, muscular legs, though at the same time he good-naturedly patted me on the shoulder. I can't say that I was pleased with the comparison thus instituted. I pride myself on having a somewhat elegant figure, you see. It is a sine qua non with the young ladies whom I affect that the young gentleman of their ideal should be "both slender and tall;" and as my person satisfies this proclivity on their part, I have hitherto "traveled" somewhat extensively "on my shape." The idea of becoming fat and parsy, like the model now set up before me, therefore, was not agreeable. Delicately I hinted as much. The General growled a reply, with rather more than his usual energy of speech.

OFFICE OF A FASHIONABLE HOTEL AT THE MEETING OF CONGRESS.

"Bah! Polkafoot, I was nearly as stout as I am now when I married Mrs. General. 'Gad! I think that was one of the very things she took into account. A sensible woman wants a man, Polkafoot —not a crane. Look at that leg! It would mount, respectably, half a dozen young sprigs like your young friend Fitz Alamode there. Certain chalk-faced, silly, romantic young school-girls may prefer such attenuated specimens of humanity; but a real woman, Sir, likes a man to have legs. (The General slapped one of his own, here with, in a cussing way.) I've equipped all my boys in that style, Polkafoot; and, 'gad, I'll bet they're the first things a flesh and blood woman sets eyes on. Now you New Yorkers cultivate the—the—"

As the General evidently hesitated for lack of a word, and I suspected what he wanted to say, I ventured to remark that the intellectual style of leg was doubtless what he meant.

"That be hanged!" the General snorted. "I mean that you cultivate the Shanghai pattern, instead of the flesh and muscle necessary to the order and happiness of society." I stared in doubt what was meant by this allusion; and the General accordingly proceeded to explain. "I hold," he continued, dogmatically, "that the lack of proper physical development among your city gentlemen is the source of all sorts of evils in your social world. What is the reason we hear, every once in a while, of some educated and accomplished young lady running off with her father's coachman, or an Irish hod-carrier, and thus overturning all the natural and reasonable barriers which society has erected against the intrusion of the lot polloi, eh? I'll tell you. It's because your legs are not stout enough to sustain the social edifice. Why did Mary Ann Baker go and marry John Dean? Because, Sir, the women like a man to have a man's physique—that's why; and they are not to blame for it, either. As for some of the other sores of society, still more lamentable in a moral point of view, they must be attributed to the same cause. What supports the——"

The finality of the discussion was that we went to dinner together; and, in answer to an inquiry, I suggested claret to begin on. "Too thin, Polkafoot—too thin altogether; but you shall have it if you like," said the General, dogmatically, at the same time writing on a wine-card, as I observed, an order for one bottle of red Bordeaux and another of Burgundy. Then he handed the same to the expectant waiter, whom he called "boy," and who at once darted off without further instructions. I had just time to observe that the "boy" in question was at least forty, and black as the Ace of Spades. En passant, I would remark that Mr. Willard's waiters, in deference to the feelings of his anti-Slavery boarders, are all "boys" of another color; namely, of the sort that, I believe, are invariably born with a shillalah in one hand and a Democratic ticket in the other. They never can rival Sambo as a table-waiter.

We sat long after the ladies had risen, and then we started for the upper stories, to indulge in a weed apiece. On the way, in the ladies' promenade, I caught sight of an old acquaintance, one of the belles of the hotel.

"Do you know that lady yonder, General? Now, Sir, I can confute your theories by a living example of one who cares more about brains than legs," said I, triumphantly. The General peered through his spectacles in the direction indicated, and answered gruffly, but at the same time with a dull sort of enthusiasm,

"That's Miss B——, the belle of Kentucky. Fine woman, Polkafoot! Observe what an expanse of bare neck and bosom she displays, eh? 'Gad, it makes an old fellow young again to look at such living statuary! No need even to say, 'By your leave, Miss!'"

"Very true, General; but her companion is the one I mean, Miss L——, of Baltimore. Her dress is a deal more modest, and though she's a belle in her third season, I tell you she's a girl of sense. Now, General, brains——"

The remark was not finished, because at that moment I caught Miss L——'s eye, and immediately got a friendly bow and hand-shake from her. Then she introduced me to Miss B——, who responded with one of those formidable, sweeping bows, or courtesies, which form so conspicuous a feature of the Lancers' Quadrille, and which it seems to be the aims of fashion to make as long and comprehensive as possible. I might have repeated the Lord's Prayer at least twice while Miss B——'s head and body described the required arc, but of course I didn't. On the contrary, I immediately bent my body so as to form an acute angle with my legs, and in this shape remained standing, much to my discomfort, and I fear, to the disarrangement of my digestion, until, after the lapse of several minutes, during which the General stood gravely by, Miss B—— asked, with an engaging air, whether I had yet made any call in Washington. I told her I had only just arrived, and that, with her permission, my first call would be upon the belle of Tennessee. She said if I meant her she should be delighted. I said I had lately been in company with a gentleman, an admirer of hers I believed, from whom I reckoned I had taken a complaint. Ah, what was that? Admiration of the belle aforesaid, I answered, gallantly. Oh, you are a flatterer, she cried, with a desperate attempt to blush. But who was the gentleman in the ought of course to know that. I said I didn't know as she ought to learn from me; the gentleman should sing his own serenades under the windows of his beauty. She thought the remark poetical, but not obliging. I told her I desired particularly to be considered obliging by the ladies, and therupon added that the gentleman in question was the Baron Grubb, minister from Deutchland. "Oh, the dear Baron, how she should scold him for talking about her!" Miss B——, cried, with affectation of great severity. Then she asked if I didn't think Grubb was a very pretty name. I told her I did, very; but I thought Baron was prettier, and Lord better than either. She said she saw that I was a wicked wit, and she expected the ladies would have to be dreadfully cut up this season, because they liked clever people with titles. I said a title was like the lamp Diogenes carried about Athens at mid-day to find an honest man with: it was almost impossible to discover a clever person in Washington except one had a title to guide the search. Miss B—— cried, "Oh!" in a very suspicious manner. She began to think my wit decidedly plebeian, and accordingly raised her eye-glass in order to put a little more distance between us. The General interposed by saying that I was the great-grandson of an Earl, and the eyeglass was suddenly dropped again. (The General knew my family history—my great-grandfather's name was Earle.) Miss L—— gave a turn to the conversation by saying there was to be a "hop" in the hotel that night were, and that as I was so useful to the ladies last season, she hoped I might be relied on to aid them in the same manner the ensuing one. I replied that she might reckon on my most devoted attention to her wishes; that it was my dearest aspiration to make myself acceptable to her in any and all possible ways. This was so near the truth that I suspect my manner was more than usually earnest, for Miss L—— blushed slightly, though without withdrawing her eyes, or betraying any girlish embarrassment. She knew very well I was in love with her. She knew, too, that I wasn't "eligible." So, with the kindest intentions in the world, she endeavored to be my very good friend, at the same time that she constantly but delicately and considerately kept throwing cold water on my passion. But it wouldn't do. I was too much of a sensible, to be like that of young ladies in general, in denying herself the glory of a conquest merely to save the feelings of an admirer, that my passion only flamed up the higher hopelessly. Well, I am not writing a chapter of confessions. Besides, if you think I am a lover of the hypochondriacal description like Werter, or of the sentimental sort like Lamartine, it is not my image you have got on your retina, but another man's. Not that man, but another man's.

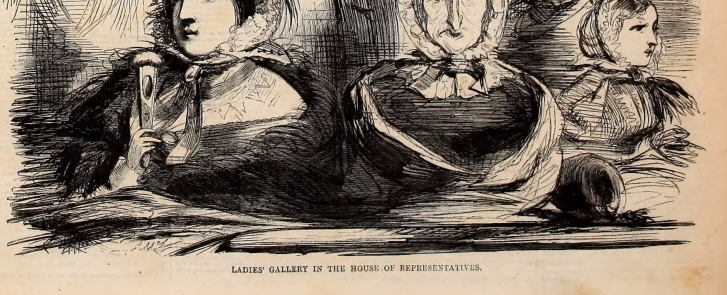
THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE.

Nevertheless I recollect quite distinctly how, at one of Senator Douglas's grand "evenings" last season, I was commissioned to get a glass of water from the supper-room; how I struggled through the frantic and hungry crowd, holding it aloft as the youth in Longfellow's poem did his banner; how, amidst a hot fire of Champagne corks, and the general ruin of the gossamer outworks, consisting of tulle, tarlatan, etc., erected for the protection of the ladies, I bore (through snow and ice) my welcome trophy to the thirsty lips of Miss L——. My reward was something that's laid away in the snuff-box of memory, like a Touka bean in my uncle's box of Macouboy. Then, at Senator Seward's, wasn't it I who drew on her overshoes with trembling hands and palpitating heart? Oh! Paul Pulladeof, why the deuce are you not "eligible?" What is the use in being a fellow unless you are a —— of a fellow?

I spent the evening with the General, spite of Alamede's entreaties that I would go and make a round of calls. We ought at once, he said, to call on the members of the Cabinet, in order that we might get invitations to their "receptions." I told him Now Year's would be time enough for that, because then we would go the whole round, take a drink, leave our cards, and thus be ex regle with a comparatively small outlay of trouble. Then he wanted particularly to go to Senator Slidell's. I knew that was solely to enable him to air his French with madame and her charming daughter; but as I don't speak French, I was immovable. The result was that he went his way and I mine. I don't pretend to say that mine was the best.



It was eleven when the General and I got through breakfast—time for the General to go to the House, and assume his place among the representatives of the nation. "How do you do, Baron?" said I, musing that distinguished plenipo upon the stairs. The Baron imparted to me, in a confidential manner, the fact that he was very well, adding, however, still more confidentially, "Ich bin schläfrig quite a little, because I have yesterday received dispatches from my Government, which I have sit up all night, nearly, to examine; therefore, I have not much sleep."

I replied, carelessly, that I understood the heir-apparent of his Serene and Exalted Highness was about to make proposals for Miss Lane, the President's niece; I presumed, therefore, that his dispatches related to that subject. The Baron very cagerly and earnestly assured me that such was not the fact, for which assurance I expressed a due sense of obligation.

Then I passed on, in order to report myself as being in readiness to begin shaving my aunt Talitha and my pretty cousin Virginia, from Swaggpodle, in York State, the lions of the capital. I haven't hitherto referred to these parties, have I? Well, concerning aunt Talitha little is to be said, except that she is a good, honest, domestic, old lady, who has hardly ever been out of sight of her native village before, and never wants to be again, if her own protestations are to be believed. It was solely for Virginia's benefit that she consented to leave her knitting-work and come on here to mingle in—no, not to mingle in, but to be among, for a season, the gayeties of Washington. And Virginia? Well, she is a very pretty girl, under eighteen, and my aunt Talitha's daughter. A somewhat unsophisticated beauty, to be sure, but quick-witted, naturally graceful, and, as I have before said, very pretty—besides having about her various "taking ways," which renders her company quite as agreeable to her male cousin as any girl he knows. I found them both dressed to go out; aunt Talitha said she didn't see me at breakfast. No, I had not left the table. Aunt Talitha lifted up her hands in astonishment. The dear old soul said she had just breakfast four hours ago, and thought she was unconscionably late then; but she couldn't get it before, because, she supposed, Mr. Willett's folks had overslept themselves. Virginia told her mother how it was, when the old lady hesitantly denounced the fashion of late breakfasting as being nothing but sheer laziness and sinful waste of time; the representatives of the nation, she said, ought to set the country an example in behalf of early rising and industry. I considered the thing so extremely funny that I laughed at it, till my aunt, who thought I was laughing at her very excellent maxim, began to take offense. So I had to explain. "My dear aunt," I exclaimed, "I beg you will throw away all ideas of sitting up the people's representatives as an example in the practice of any of the virtues, at least. If you want to teach the most successful method of wasting time in the easiest way to steal, you'll find them capital good instructors; but industry and honest labor have long been out of date here. Did you ever hear about the Forty Thieves, aunt?" She said she had read about them in the "Arabian Nights." I said I didn't suppose, then, that the Forty Thieves who were members of the last Congress, She exclaimed, with a good deal of astonishment, that she didn't know that the people elected thieves to Congress—it was a crying shame if they did. I replied that the propensity for stealing was, probably, inchoate when they were elected, but that it very quickly became developed after they got here. Ashamed of being compelled to say such trite things, I added that it was time for us to go down to the Capitol, if we were going; and though my aunt said that she didn't care to see "such doings" as I hinted at, she, nevertheless, gave us the pleasure of her company—a circumstance that compelled us to walk.

Virginia wanted to know when I was going to take her to call on the President? I asked her, by way of a Yankee reply, whether she had any idea what would be the nature of the interview? She said she hadn't. I said that she would be introduced to Mr. Buchanan, and that he would ask her, with an air of deep interest, the following question: "Have you visited the Smithsonian Institute, Miss?" If she said No, he would advise her, gravely, to go and see it; and would then relapse into a solemn and moody silence. How did I know? Oh, that's just what he says to every lady who calls on him, and that's all. Virginia thought it was very funny that Mr. Buchanan couldn't say more original than that; and said it was no wonder he had always remained a bachelor. I told her we would go to the Smithsonian first, and thus deprive him of half his regular speech; perhaps that would force him to say something else, but I doubted it. Virginia thought we had better not do so then; it might embarrass Mr. Buchanan, and then she should probably be embarrassed herself, which would be apt to make the interview very distressing to both. I said, recklessly, that I didn't care; for which bitter speech my pretty cousin reproved me severely.

I told my aunt it was a mile and a half at least down to the Capitol, and asked her if we hadn't better take an omnibus? She said a mile and a half was no sort of a walk; besides, she wanted to see the shops along Pennsylvania Avenue. I believe she did see them all, as well as all they contained; but at last her attention was riveted by a near view of the Capitol. She thought that was a very big and grand house, and she supposed the members of it must be big and grand too. I said it would do; but that it occupied a very disrespectful position—with its rear turned toward the city and the President's, and its front southward, like a horse harnessed at the tail-end of a cart. We went round, in order to enter in front. My aunt wanted to know what that naked man alongside of the steps was going to do with that great ball he had in his hands; and what the Indian girl by his side was at? I told her it was a statue of Columbus, and I had heard say that he was in the act of challenging the statue of Washington, at the other end of the square, to play a game of ball with him; but I thought it was intended to represent Columbus holding a ball of yarn, and about to teach the Indian girl how to knit. My aunt said that was very good of him; but added, a little timidly, that he and the girl both would look better if they had more clothes on.

While my aunt was looking at and admiring the pictures in the Rotunda, Miss B—— came sailing by, accompanied by the Baron. She honored aunt Tabitha and Virginia with a haughty stare through her eye-glass, but affected not to see me at all. My pretty modest little cousin was quite cut up by that splendid person's supercilious air—I think somebody must have blown on the General's story about my being the great-grandson of an earl; and her inspection of my companions no doubt satisfied her that I was altogether too much of a plebeian to be recognized thus publicly by the grand-daughter of a Tennessee judge. However, I caught the eye of an old acquaintance just then, who drew me a little one side, in a confidential way, and, after a few commonplaces, told me that he was a candidate for the vacant mission to Siam, and wanted me to help him by getting General F—— to write him a letter of recommendation. I asked if he had ever met the General? He said he had not; but he thought that would make no difference, as I could write the letter and get the General to copy and sign it. I told him I would speak to him about it. Just then one of the members from New York, Hon. J—n C——e, emerged from a door on the other side, and passed rapidly across the Rotunda, casting furtive glances about him. He evidently caught a sight of the applicant for the Siam mission, and, fearful of being button-holed by him, pulled his hat down over his eyes and made splendid time for the door leading to the Hall of the Representatives. But the candidate saw him, headed him off, and pounced triumphantly down on him. The honorable gentleman made a desperate effort to pass with just a nod, but the candidate seized him by the shoulder and held him fast while he poured out the history of his claims to office, and solicited the impatient Representative's influence in getting him the mission.

"These office-seekers are worse than the plagues of Egypt!" said Mr. C——e to me, the next day, with an energetic imprecation that sounded vastly like an oath. "I'd as lief be bored to death by Guinea-worms as to be beset as I am by them. Now that fellow who wants to go to Siam, I don't know him at all, or just barely to speak, and yet he came to me yesterday, and what do you think he wanted me to do? Why, in the first place, he asked me to write a letter for him, take it around, and get it signed by all my friends in the House and Senate, and then to go with him and urge his case personally on the President and Cabinet! I told him I had something else to occupy my time. I wish he and his whole tribe might be sent to Siam or—the devil!"

The Rotunda is the rendezvous of these borers and of the lobby; and the members tell me it is almost impossible for them to pass through there without being waylaid by some of them. This fact explains why I see members and senators come sneaking into the Capitol by unexpected side passages, darting furtive glances around them as they emerge from the cover of a pillar, seeking cover again as quickly as possible, and at last bolting into their respective chambers as if they were afraid a constable was at their heels. In my aforetime simplicity I imagined that these gentlemen avoided observation because they were oppressed with a lingering sense of shame for some of their actions; but I perceive now that I gave them too much credit. Then, when I saw a member sneaking about in this way, I always, in consideration of his feelings, pretended not to see him; but now I understand it I have no sympathy with them. I think they ought to get every body an office who asks them for one. I think it is the duty of a Representative to provide an office for every one of his constituents—at least for all those who voted for him, or spent their money to elect him.

Aunt Tabitha was delighted with the magnificence of the halls, tiled floors, and stairways of grained marble, to be seen in the new part of the Capitol. I ventured to introduce her into one of the committee rooms. The richness of the furniture, and the fresco adornments of the walls struck her as being something very gorgeous. Virginia hesitated about going in, because there sat the clerk, in a stuffed easy chair, with his feet on a table, lazily smoking a cheroot, and it seemed like going into a gentleman's private apartment. Aunt Tabitha wanted to know, as soon as we went out, if that gentleman wasn't the chairman of the committee. I answered that I guessed he was. It is impossible for me to describe the effect produced upon the dear old lady by the blazing splendor of the new Representative hall. The gilt, the glitter, the painting, carving, the wonderful ceiling, and all that, quite overcame her. She looked down upon the members, lounging in their red morocco-covered chairs, with a species of awe. "Do you think you'll ever be a member of Congress, Paul?" she asked, in a reverential whisper. I answered that all young Americans expected to be members of Congress some day or other, and I supposed that I might reasonably entertain the same idea. My aunt looked as if she thought I might, and then her attention was drawn away by the rising of a member to address the House. The member happened to be the Hon. L—— M. K——, of South Carolina, who frowned, tossed his head, strode back and forth in the aisle, gesticulated, and spoke in such an impressive style that the old lady was quite rapt. "That's real eloquence," she whispered to me, as the honorable gentleman sat down, stroking his beard and glancing up at the galleries to observe the effect he had produced. It seems he caught somebody's eye up there, for he smiled sweetly, bounded from his seat, disappeared for an instant, appeared again in the gallery, and dropped down alongside of the smiling and gratified Miss B——. A smart flirtation sprung up at once, and I could see that the Baron looked unhappy. Soon quite a bevy of members had collected around the charming young lady in the gallery. Another batch left the hall, in a body, to go over to the corner and get a drink (as I learned on inquiring at the bar afterward). A member from New England, who had evidently been up late the night before, stretched himself out on a sofa and went to sleep. A member from the South lighted a cigar and very composedly puffed away on it in a corner. Some put their feet up on their morocco-covered desks. Some stood around and talked. Some wrote and franked letters. The clerk read away on some bill or other, which nobody listened to; the reporters scribbled away, and the member from New England, asleep on the sofa, at last actually snored. He had just been re-elected for another two years, and therefore didn't care whether school kept or not. I didn't either. Because, in fact, as the old lady very soon became so much absorbed in the proceedings that any further present attention to her was needless, I found it quite agreeable to devote myself assiduously to my pretty cousin. By-and-by, however, Fitz Alamode came and sat down by us. I think Fitz is a little inclined to be sweet on Virginia. In fact, he did us all the honor of gallanting her back to the hotel, leaving me to the sole charge of my aunt.

Ten o'clock, p.m.—The member from the Swampoodle district has just dropped into my room, and says that young Alamode has been asking him about what fortune Miss Virginia is likely to have. I was delighted to hear that he had the sense to tell Fitz a few thousand dollars was all, and that he had said nothing about the rich old relative who has put down her name in his will for a very large cargo of the desirable spoons. I shall take care that the confounded little fortune-hunter don't hear of that.

A few minutes later I had the honor of a call from the correspondent of the New York Daily Thundergust. He told me that it was positively determined to remove Collector Schell, and that the vacant place was going to be conferred, at the instance of Hon. D. E. Sickles, upon the Benicia Boy. He added, by way of confirmation, that Mr. Buchanan had that very day been seen to take the Benicia Boy into a clothes-press, where a long and entirely private consultation had been held, the particulars of which he had obtained in detail for the Thundergust exclusively, and sent on by telegraph to that journal.

To-morrow my aunt is going again up to the House, while Miss Virginia and myself are going to call on the President.

LITERARY.

SELF-MADE MEN, by Chas. C. B. Seymour, published by Harper & Brothers, is a book which deserves wide circulation. It is a collection of well-selected and admirably-digested biographical sketches of men who, by dint of industrious and virtuous perseverance, have attained wealth, eminence, or usefulness; and to such men the minds of the young can never be too frequently directed. For a present to a young man we know nothing better than such a volume—at once a source of interest and a gallery of noble exemplars. Boys will study its pages with intensest admiration; for real life presents scenes that romance does not, in which the reader is able to appreciate the moral because he knows that the story is truth, and from which he derives a lesson that no tale of fancy can equal. To be such a man, to achieve such a success, to conquer such an enemy, to crush such a temptation—these are the objects of ambition which the volume offers, and which the reader seizes on and adopts as his own.

The author of "Peter Schlemihl in America," Mr. George Wood, has written another curious book, and Derby & Jackson have published it. The title, FUTURE LIFE; OR, SCENES IN ANOTHER WORLD, sufficiently explains to those who remember Peter what they may expect in this work, which does not equal its predecessor in any respect, but nevertheless possesses the interest of a very odd book. Peter Schlemihl—whether with or without his shadow does not appear, but with one Mrs. Jay, a New York lady—having passed through death, visits other worlds inhabited by various orders of beings, among whom angels and the redeemed souls of the former denizens of this sphere seem to be wandering; and with these various spirits Peter and his friend hold converse, not on fixed fate, free-will, foreknowledge, or any other subjects of that lofty and spiritual character, but mostly on crinoline and the opera, and other topics that may be supposed to interest the earthly readers of the story. Some truth is taught, some sharp things are well said, and some follies satirized; but, on the whole, we do not think that Mr. Wood's good hits repay us for the very commonplace notions we get from his book of the future life, and the inevitable conclusion at which we arrive that some members of higher circles in the "future life" are very stupid people, who had learned very little in this world and have made no advance in the other.

Derby & Jackson also publish a novel, WHILE IT WAS MORNING, by Virginia F. Townsend, which we have not been able to read except in passages here and there, from which we have marked the book as written in a simple and delicate style that promises well for the whole.

Mrs. Mary J. Holmes has written some very popular stories, and C. M. Saxton now publishes two of them in one volume—DORA DEANE and MAGGIE MILLER.

Dr. Macduff's STORY OF BETHLEHEM, written for the young in the Doctor's admirable style, and illustrated profusely, is a fine book for the small folks about Christmas time. Carter & Brothers publish it.

MATTHEW CARABY is an American novel, published by Mason Brothers, the interest of the story turning on the death of a city merchant, who, becoming insolvent, insures his life largely and commits suicide by smoking morphine in a cigar. One of his clerks, whose history has been the burden of the previous portions of the story, is tried for the murder, and acquitted with the aid of the insurance companies and a providential witness. The book is not above the average of late novels.

R. M. Dewitt publishes THE TENANT HOUSE, a novel, by A. J. H. Duganne, to which more than usual attention is invited by the array of distinguished names appended to commendatory letters. The author has made a story out of the abundant material which such places as the Old Brewery furnish; and one can hardly doubt, while reading, that the descriptive portions are drawn from reality, and terrible reality. The plot does not commend itself to ordinary notions of the probable. The various inhabitants of the barrack-houses are led through the mazes of a romantic story, and turn out to be, most of them, children of wealthy parents, or in some way connected with wealthy people, and in the end are pretty much all made comfortable by the accidents of life more than by the results of industry. All this, however, is the author's license as a novelist, and designed to bring before the world, in a readable form, his sketches of real life in the haunts of poverty, and in this view the book is calculated to do good. The work is further commendable in the fact that it teaches distinctly and clearly the influence of the Christian religion in reforming vice and reclaiming the destitute. Mr. Duganne has had means of information on the subject of tenant houses in New York which give to his relations the value of careful observation, and make them worthy the serious attention of all who desire to relieve the destitute and abandoned.

A young English lord, Lord Dufferin, in 1856, went in his yacht, The Foam, to northern latitudes, and touched at Iceland, where he had the jolliest of times for some weeks, visiting the Geysers, and getting gloriously drunk with the Icelanders, and making after-dinner speeches of the funniest kind in French, English, and, above all, in the funniest Latin. Prince Napoleon came along with his fleet, and took The Foam in tow behind La Reine Hortense steamer, and they pushed off for Jan Mayen, a lonesome island within the Arctic circle. But the Prince got out of coal, and shook off the yacht to pursue her own voyage by wind; and she did reach that desolate shore, and return thence to Norway, and at length sailed northward until this little craft, with but two inches of thin plank to resist the ice, actually reached a latitude within one hundred miles as far north as any expedition has hitherto attained. Lord Dufferin wrote letters to his mother, and told her of all his fun, fact, and fancy as he went on this strange pleasure-trip in a yacht; and these letters form the volume of LETTERS FROM HIGH LATITUDES, which Ticknor & Fields have now republished, and of which we have once before casually spoken. If we do not mistake, we related then the story of the cock who became crazy when the sun did not set any more, and actually drowned himself in a fit of nervous excitement. The book is a very careless and reckless lot of stuff, which will not increase the young lord's literary reputation, but will amuse readers more than any thing of the sort that has recently appeared. His Latin speech at the dinner is the gem of the story, and worth the price of the volume.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

CONGRESS met on 6th inst., and proceeded to business. In the Senate, Senator Mason gave notice that he would, on Tuesday, call up the case of the schooner Amistad; permission granted by 24 to 19. The President's Message was received and read. Comments thereon were made by Senators Bigler and Hale.——In the House, seats were drawn for, and several notices of bills and resolutions were given. The Message was then received and read.

On 7th, in the Senate, Senator Wilson gave notice of a bill to appropriate 1,000,000 acres of public lands for the support of free schools in the District of Columbia. Senator Gwin gave notice that he would call up the Pacific Railroad Bill at an early day. Some other personal matters were noticed.——In the House, a resolution requesting the President to take steps for the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty was referred to the Committee of the Whole; a motion to lay on the table having been negatived by 93 to 90. Mr. Billinghurst moved to take the Pacific Railroad out of the hands of the Select Committee appointed on the subject; lost. Mr. Bernhisel offered a resolution to refund to Utah the expenses incurred in suppressing Indian hostilities in 1853, and to construct a wagon-road from Bridger's Pass to Salt Lake City. Mr. Stevens offered a resolution for a wagon-road through Washington Territory.

On 9th, in the Senate, Senator Iverson gave notice of a motion to abolish the franking privilege, and to substitute a commutation in money. Several memorials were presented, and the standing Committees were appointed.——In the House, the standing Committees were appointed. Mr. Harris gave notice of bills to render Territorial Governors and Judges elective, to admit sugar and salt free of duty, and to amend the naturalization laws. The case of Judge Watrous was then taken up, and discussed by Messrs. Ready, Houston, Craige, Reagan, Cochrane, Chapman, and Tappan.

On 10th, in the Senate, considerable routine business was transacted.——In the House, Mr. Boyce moved to admit Lieutenant Mowry as Delegate from Arizona; objected to. The case of Judge Watrous was then further discussed by Messrs. Billinghurst, Ready, and Davis.

On Saturday, the Senate not being in session, the House was occupied all day with the Watrous impeachment.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The President's Message was sent into Congress on December 8. It is longer even than such documents usually are. We can of course only find space for a few very brief extracts. After alluding to the settlement of the Kansas and Utah questions, and throwing out some suggestions as to the organization of future Territories, the President passes to our foreign relations.

THE RIGHT OF SEARCH QUESTION.

"I am gratified to inform you that the long pending controversy between the two governments, in relation to the question of visitation and search, has been amicably adjusted. The claim on the part of Great Britain, forcibly to visit American vessels on the high seas in the time of peace, could not be sustained under the law of nations, and it had been overruled by her own most eminent jurists. This question was recently brought to an issue by the repeated acts of British cruisers in boarding and searching our merchant vessels in the Gulf of Mexico and the adjacent seas. * * * Remonstrances were addressed to the British government against these violations of our rights of sovereignty. The British government promptly avowed its recognition of the principles of international law upon this subject, as laid down by the government of the United States, in the note of the Secretary of State to the British Minister at Washington, of April 10, 1858, which secure the vessels of the United States upon the high seas from visitation or search in time of peace, under any circumstances whatever. The claim has been abandoned in a manner reflecting honor on the British government, and evincing a just regard for the law of nations, and can not fail to strengthen the amicable relations between the two countries.

"The British government at the same time proposed to the United States that some mode should be adopted, by mutual arrangement between the two countries, of a character which may be found effective without being offensive, for verifying the nationality of vessels suspected on good grounds for carrying false colors. They have also invited the United States to take the initiative, and propose measures for this purpose. While declining to assume so grave a responsibility, the Secretary of State has informed the British government that we are ready to receive any proposals which they may feel disposed to offer having this object in view, and to consider them in an amicable spirit. A strong opinion is, however, expressed that the occasional abuse of the flag of any nation is an evil far less to be deprecated than would be the establishment of any regulations which might be incompatible with the freedom of the seas. This government has yet received no communication specifying the manner in which the British government would propose to carry out their suggestion; and I am inclined to believe that no plan which can be devised will be free from grave embarrassments. Still, I shall form no decided opinion on the subject until I shall have carefully and in the best spirit examined any proposals which they may think proper to make."

THE CASE OF MEXICO.

In relation to Mexico, the President says: "The imposition of the contribution upon foreigners is considered an unjust and oppressive measure. Besides, internal factions in other parts of the republic were at the same time levying similar exactions upon the property of our citizens, and interrupting their commerce. There had been an entire failure on the part of our Minister to secure redress for the wrongs which our citizens had endured, notwithstanding his persevering efforts. And from the temper manifested by the Mexican government he had repeatedly assured us that no favorable change could be expected until the United States should 'give striking evidence of their will and power to protect their citizens,' and that 'severe chastening is the only earthly remedy for our grievances.'

"Abundant cause now undoubtedly exists for a resort to hostilities against the government still holding possession of the capital. Should they succeed in subduing the Constitutional forces, all reasonable hope will then have expired of a peaceful settlement of our difficulties.

"On the other hand, should the Constitutional party prevail, and their authority be established over the republic, there is reason to hope that they will be animated by a less unfriendly spirit, and may grant that redress to American citizens which justice requires, so far as they may possess the means. But for this expectation, I should at once have recommended to Congress to grant the necessary power to the President to take possession of a sufficient portion of the remote and unsettled territory of Mexico, to be held in pledge until our injuries shall be redressed and our just demands be satisfied. We have already exhausted every milder means of obtaining justice. In such a case this remedy of reprisals is recognized by the law of nations, not only as just in itself, but as a means of preventing actual war.

THE PROTECTORATE OVER CHIHUAHUA AND SONORA.

"But there is another view of our relations with Mexico, arising from the unhappy condition of affairs along our southwestern frontier, which demands immediate action. In that remote region, where there are but few white inhabitants, large bands of hostile and predatory Indians roam promiscuously over the Mexican States of Chihuahua and Sonora and our adjoining Territories. The local governments of these States are perfectly helpless, and are kept in a state of constant alarm by the Indians. They have not the power, if they possessed the will, even to restrain lawless Mexicans from passing the border and committing depredations on our remote settlers. A state of anarchy and violence prevails throughout that distant frontier. The laws are a dead letter, and life and property are wholly insecure. For this reason the settlement of Arizona is arrested, while it is of great importance that a chain of inhabitants should extend all along its southern border, sufficient for their own protection and that of the United States mail passing to and from California. Well-founded apprehensions are now entertained, that the Indians, and wandering Mexicans, equally lawless, may break up the important stage and postal communication recently established between our Atlantic and Pacific possessions. This passes very near to the Mexican boundary, throughout the whole length of Arizona. I can imagine no possible remedy for these evils, and no mode of restoring law and order on that remote and unsettled frontier, but for the Government of the United States to assume a temporary protectorate over the northern portions of Chihuahua and Sonora, and to establish military posts within the same; and this I earnestly recommend to Congress. This protection may be withdrawn as soon as local governments shall be established in these Mexican States, capable of performing their duties to the United States, restraining the lawless and preserving peace along the border."

THE CUBA QUESTION.

"It has been made known to the world by my predecessors, that the United States have, on several occasions, endeavored to acquire Cuba from Spain by honorable negotiation. If this were accomplished, the last relic of the African slave-trade would instantly disappear. We would not, if we could, acquire Cuba in any other manner. This is due to our national character. All the territory which we have acquired since the origin of the government has been by fair purchase from France, Spain, and Mexico, or by the free and voluntary act of the independent State of Texas in blending her destinies with our own. This course we shall ever pursue, unless circumstances should occur, which we do not now anticipate, rendering a departure from it clearly justifiable, under the imperative and overruling law of self-preservation.

"The island of Cuba, from its geographical position, commands the mouth of the Mississippi, and the immense and annually increasing trade, foreign and coastwise, from the valley of that noble river, now embracing half the sovereign States of the Union. With that island under the dominion of a distant foreign Power, this trade, of vital importance to these States, is exposed to the danger of being destroyed in time of war, and it has hitherto been subjected to perpetual injury and annoyance in time of peace. Our relations with Spain, which ought to be of the most friendly character, must always be placed in jeopardy while the existing colonial government over the island shall remain in its present condition.

"While the possession of the island would be of vast importance to the United States, its value to Spain is, comparatively, unimportant. Such was the relative situation of the parties when the great Napoleon transferred Louisiana to the United States. Jealous, as he ever was, of the national honor and interests of France, no person throughout the world has imputed blame to him for accepting a pecuniary equivalent for this cession.

"The publicity which has been given to our former negotiations upon this subject, and the large appropriation which may be required to effect the purpose, render it expedient, before making another attempt to renew the negotiation, that I should lay the whole subject before Congress. This is especially necessary, as it may become indispensable to success that I should be intrusted with the means of making an advance to the Spanish government immediately after the signing of the treaty, without awaiting the ratification of it by the Senate. I am encouraged to make this suggestion by the example of Mr. Jefferson previous to the purchase of Louisiana from France, and by that of Mr. Polk in view of the acquisition of territory from Mexico. I refer the whole subject to Congress, and commend it to their careful consideration."

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

"The public debt on the 1st of July, 1858—the commencement of the present fiscal year—was $25,155,977 66.

"During the first quarter of the present year the sum of $10,000,000 has been negotiated of the loan authorized by the act of 14th of June, 1858—making the present outstanding public debt, exclusive of Treasury notes, $35,155,977 66. There was, on the 1st of July, 1858, of Treasury notes issued by authority of the act of December 23, 1857, unredeemed, the sum of $19,754,800—making the amount of actual indebtedness, at that date, $54,910,777 66. To this will be added $10,000,000 during the present fiscal year, this being the remaining half of the loan of $20,000,000 not yet negotiated.

"The rapid increase of the public debt, and the necessity which exists for a modification of the tariff, to meet even the ordinary expenses of the government, ought to admonish us all, in our respective spheres of duty, to the practice of rigid economy. The objects of expenditure should be limited in number, as far as this may be practicable, and the appropriations necessary to carry them into effect ought to be disbursed under the strictest accountability. Enlightened economy does not consist in the refusal to appropriate money for constitutional purposes essential to the defense, progress, and prosperity of the republic, but in taking care that none of this money shall be wasted by mismanagement in its application to the objects designated by law."

A REVENUE TARIFF.

"It is our true policy to increase our revenue so as to equal our expenditures. It would be ruinous to continue to borrow. Besides, it may be proper to observe that the incidental protection thus afforded by a revenue tariff would, at the present moment, to some extent increase the confidence of the manufacturing interests, and give a fresh impulse to our reviving business. To this, surely, no person will object.

"In regard to the mode of assessing and collecting duties under a strictly revenue tariff, I have long entertained and often expressed the opinion that sound policy requires this should be done by specific duties, in cases to which these can be properly applied. They are well adapted to commodities which are usually sold by weight or measure, and which, from their nature, are of equal or of nearly equal value. Such, for example, are the articles of iron of different classes, raw sugar, and foreign wines and spirits.

"In my deliberate judgment, specific duties are the best, if not the only means of securing the revenue against false and fraudulent invoices, and such has been the practice adopted for this purpose by other commercial nations. Besides, specific duties would afford to the American manufacturer the incidental advantages to which he is fairly entitled under a revenue tariff. The present system is a sliding scale to his disadvantage. Under it, when prices are high and business prosperous, the duties rise in amount when he least requires their aid. On the contrary, when prices fall, and he is struggling against adversity, the duties are diminished in the same proportion, greatly to his injury."

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

The authorized strength of the army, as posted, is 18,165, but the actual strength, on July 1, was 17,498. These troops compose the whole numerical force of our army, distributed through the States and Territories of the entire Confederacy, manning all the fortifications occupied by the troops, holding all posts now garrisoned, defending all our extended frontiers, and protecting, as far as possible, the different routes extending across the continent, from the Mississippi Valley to our possessions on the Pacific.

In speaking of the war with the Indians on the Pacific, the Secretary says that a permanent peace has been established by treaties entered into with them, and the army has been already distributed to points where the presence of a force was greatly needed.

The Secretary says he has attempted, as far as possible, to meet the just wishes of Congress in reducing the expenses, and the estimates of the next fiscal year are less than the appropriations for the last by the sum of $9,160,488. They are less than the estimates laid before Congress at the last session by the sum of $2,736,408. They amount, in the aggregate, to $18,010,090; and he entertains a strong hope that the expenditure may be still further reduced in the course of another year.

REPORT OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

For the support of the navy and marine corps, and all other objects under the control of the Navy Department, for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, the estimates were $13,803,212; appropriations, $14,240,247; expenditures, $13,870,684; there having been some curtailment of expense by reason of a falling off in the revenue. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, the estimates were $14,616,298; appropriations, $14,508,354; these having been largely retrenched in consequence of a diminution of the revenue, and again increased by appropriating $1,200,000 for eight light draft war-steamers, which were not embraced in the estimates. For the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1860, the estimates are $13,500,370, including $674,000 for completing the eight light draft steamers, authorized at the last session of Congress, and not including the usual compensation of $985,850 for steamship and mail service.

POST-OFFICE REPORT.

The Postmaster-General says that the expenses of the Department, over and above its resources, have regularly increased ever since the reduction of postages. It would, however, be obviously erroneous to suppose that the charge upon the Treasury is to progress in a ratio proportionate to what it has been for the last few years. Our postal system is now extended over the whole country, from one ocean to the other.

The Postmaster-General proposes, in lieu of the franking privilege now allowed by law to members of Congress, that the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, or such other officer as may be designated for the purpose, furnish the members with postage stamps to be used on all letters, public documents, and packets transmitted by them in the mails, and keep an account of the stamps furnished to each member, to be paid for out of the contingent fund of the House.

To avoid dissatisfaction and the practical inconvenience of having different rates of postage regulated by distances, it is respectfully submitted whether one uniform rate of five cents for all distances would not enlarge the usefulness of the Department, and diminish, if it did not entirely prevent, such heavy drafts upon the Treasury, and best promote the interest and convenience of the people.

The whole number of post-offices on 30th June last was 27,977, of which 400 are of the class denominated presidential; whole number established during the last fiscal year, 2121; number discontinued, 730; increase, 1391; number of postmasters appointed, 8284. Of these 4525 were to fill vacancies occasioned by resignation, 998 by removals, 278 by deaths, 292 by change of names and sites, and 2121 on establishment of new offices. Whole number of offices December 1, 1858, 28,573. On the 30th June last there were in operation 8296 mail routes. The number of contractors was 7044. The length of these routes is estimated at 260,603 miles; total amount of transportation, 78,765,461 miles, and cost $7,795,418.

Compared with the service reported June 30, 1857, there is an addition of 18,002 miles to the length of routes, and $1,173,372 to the cost. The total estimates for the current year are $10,615,947. The total expenditures of the Department in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1858, amounted to $12,722,470. The estimated receipts and expenditures in 1859: expenditures, $14,776,520; means, $11,094,393; deficiency, $3,682,127.

REPORT OF THE LAND-OFFICE.

The report of the Land-office covers five quarters. During that period there were 15,209,570 acres of public lands surveyed, which, with former surveys, made a quantity of 61,951,046 acres of the public lands surveyed and ready for market on the 30th September, 1858, which had never before been offered at public sale.

During the same period there were sold for cash 4,804,919 4-100, from which was realized $2,534,192 20, located with Military Land Warrants, $6,083,110 00, and reported Swamp Land Grants of 1,401,565 8-000 acres; making an aggregate of cash sales, land warrant locations, and swamp selections of $12,183,594 54.

DEPARTURE OF THE FILIBUSTERS FROM MOBILE.

Telegraphic messages from Mobile state that the schooner Susan, Captain Marcy, sailed from that port on 6th inst., with 140 passengers and well provisioned, but without a clearance, on pretense of being bound on a coasting voyage. Before reaching Mobile Point, she was overhauled by an armed boat from the cutter M'Clelland, and stopped. The passengers on board the Susan threatened the cutter men with violence.

Finally, after some delay, the cutter M'Clelland fired into the Susan, but no damage was caused. Lieutenant White, of the cutter, remained on board the Susan "as a guest."

A VISIT TO BERLIN HEIGHTS.

The Cleveland Plaindealer publishes the following letter, purporting to be written by an itinerant showman who called one day upon the communists of Berlin Heights:

"Here i am at Berlin Hites amung the Free-Lovers. I arrove hear last Toosday & bitterly doo i cuss the Day i ever sot foot in this retched place. I hearn tell of these Free-Luvirs for sum time & i thawt ide cum and see that kind of kritters they was. I pitcht my tent in a field near the Luv Cure, as they kall it & unfoldid my bannir to the Breese. Bimby the people kommensed fur to pour into my show & i begun for to kongratulate myself on doing a stavin bisness. But they ur a corney-lookin set, i must say. The mens fases was all kivered with hair and they looked half starved to deth. The wimmen was wus nor the men. They wore trowsis, short gownds and straw hats, with fadid green ribbins onto them, & they all kerrid bloo kotton umbrellers in their hands. Bimeby a perfekly orful looking femaile presentid herself to the dore. Hur gound was skanderlously short, & hur trowsis was shameful to behold. Sez she, 'Ar, kin it be? yes, tis trou, O tis trou?' Sez i, '15 sents marm.' Sez she, '& so ive found you at larst—at larst, O at larst.' Sez i, 'Yes yu has found me at larst & you wood have found me at fust if you had cum sunner.' Sez she, 'Ar you a man?' Sez i, 'i think i air, but if yer dowt it yu may address Mrs. A. Ward, Baldinsville, Injianny, postidge pade, & she will dowtliss giv yu the required infurmashun.' Sez she, 'Then yu air what the wurld cawls marrid?' I sed, 'Yes marm, i air.' The eksentric female then grabd me by the arm & sez she, in a wild voise, 'You air mine, O you air mine!' 'Scarcely,' sez i, as i released myself from her irun grasp. She agane clutched me by the arm & sed, 'You air my affinerty.' Sez i, 'What upon arth is that?' 'Dost thow not know?' sez she. 'No marm,' sez i, 'i dostunt.' Sez she, 'Listen man, & ile tell ye. Fur years ive yearned for thee. I knowd thou wast in the wurld sumwhares, altho i knowd not thy name or plase of residunce. My hart sed he wood cum & i took currige. He has cum—he is heur—yu air him—yu air my affinerty! O tis two mutch—two mutch!' and she bust out a cryin. 'Yes,' sez i, 'i think it is darn site two mutch.' 'Hast thow not yearned fur me?' she yelled, ringing her hands like a femaile play actor. Sez I, 'not a yearn.' Bi this time a grate krowd of free lovirs had kollectid around us, & they all kommensed fur to holler 'shame,' 'brute,' 'beast,' etsettery, etsettery. I wus jest as mad as a Martch hair. Sez i, 'yu pack of ornery critters go away frum me & taik this retchid woomun along with yu. My name is Artemus Ward, & ime in the show bisinis. i pay my bills & mind my own 'fairs. ime a married man & my childrun all look like me if i am a showman; I dont go in fur setting the laws of my country at defiance. I aint in favur of privatearin or nothing else illegal. I think yure affinerty business is cussed nonsense, besides bein outrajusly wicked. I pored 4th my indignation in this way until i gut out of breth, when i stopt. I took down my tent & i shall leeve town this evening. A. Ward."

A CONSCIENTIOUS EDITOR!!!

"Mr. Deck," says an Ohio editor, "is an American by birth, and one of the most respectable men in our community. His height is six feet—straight as an arrow—and weighs, when stripped, 206 pounds. He proposes to fight Tom Hyer for $5000 a side. His huge and giant-like frame indicates him to be a man of very superior strength; and, though we hope the two combatants may never meet, yet if a transaction so disgraceful should ever occur, we predict for the Buckeye Boy the championship of the world."

A YOUNG LADY IN A TRANCE.

We read in the Boston Journal: "We have been informed of the following singular case, which we publish in the hope that it may elicit information which will solve the mystery connected therewith. On Monday morning last, as the train from Fall River reached Bridgewater, a young lady, apparently seventeen or eighteen years old, and well dressed, who was on board, complained of sudden illness, and requested to be left at that station. Her wish was complied with, and she called for a hackman and requested to be taken to the best hotel in the place. She was taken to the Bridgewater Hotel and shown to a room, when she immediately retired. As she did not appear the next morning, the landlord went to her room and knocked, but received no answer. He then had the door opened, and found the young lady in bed, and, apparently, in a sound sleep. Efforts were made to awaken her, but they were unsuccessful, and physicians were called in. Their efforts to restore her to consciousness up to this morning were ineffectual, and she remained in the same condition as she was found on Tuesday morning. The physicians say that there are no evidences of poison about her, and they do not know what to make of the case. She has nothing with her to indicate who she is or where she belongs. Her luggage consisted of a valise, in which was a note addressed to Abigail MacIntyre; and also a Bible, in which was a recommendation of one church to another (what churches they were our informant does not recollect). She had, also, in her pocket railroad checks from Fairhaven to Middleboro', from which it is surmised that she may have come from Fairhaven or New Bedford. The incident creates a great deal of interest in Bridgewater."

THE WAY OF THE TRANSGRESSOR.

The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser says: "Some twelve or fourteen years ago Harlow Case was a respectable and esteemed citizen of Buffalo. He held the place of assistant-postmaster under Mr. Dorsheimer, and was for many years intrusted with the more important duties of the office. A member of one of the Baptist churches, upright in every walk of life, married, and the father of a family, he seemed to be as firm in the straightforward paths of virtue as any other. Removing to Sandusky, Ohio, he received the appointment of Collector of that port under Mr. Fillmore. The appointment was one universally approved, and the numerous friends of Case in this city were rejoiced at his success in life. While holding that office he was intimate in the family of a Mr. F——, one of his assistants. Mrs. F—— was young, beautiful, impassioned, and a fatal attachment grew up between the two, which remained unsuspected until the truth was made known by the sudden elopement of Case with Mrs. F——, and the simultaneous discovery that he had absconded with Government funds to the amount of some $34,000. From that time forward nearly all trace of the guilty pair was lost. The family of Case, bereaved and betrayed, remained hopeless in their grief. Mr. F—— engaged in a long but fruitless chase of the fugitives. And now from off the sea come tidings, a broken, half-told story of lonely wanderings in foreign lands; a full recital of a never-ceasing remorse, with pitiful and solitary deaths in far-away islands and on the stormy waters of the Indian Ocean. Both victims of unhallowed passion are asleep—the mother in the groves of Ceylon, the little child in the coral forests of the sea. The betrayer still wanders the earth, the heavy hand of an avenging God upon him, and sends to his abandoned home this message of his sorrow."

PERSONAL.

A letter from Senator Sumner, dated Paris, Nov. 18, says:

"To-morrow morning there will be a consultation of physicians on my case, to ascertain where I am now, at what stage I have arrived, and what remains to be done. I regret that I can not announce the result of this conference by the steamer that takes this letter. I fear that it will be against my return this winter to my public duties. At all events, I shall not return before January. * * * * My summer, down to the close of August, was most painful and harassing. My sufferings were complicated. There seemed to be hardly an ache or smart in nature which did not visit me, and at times with an intensity which was overpowering. But now I am comfortable. Two physicians express the opinion that I have made a most perceptible advance. I think so too. I am sure of it. At times I have despaired; but now I am confident that I shall be as well as ever. I can not express the disappointment I feel in this protracted separation from my duties. I long—oh, how I long!—to have my natural health, and once more renew my old labors—twelve or fourteen hours a day."

The Hon. James Chesnut, Jun., elected Senator from South Carolina for the short term, is between forty and fifty years of age, and a graduate of Princeton. According to the South Carolinian, he will go to Washington about the 1st of January.

The Howard Tribune announces the marriage of the Hon. John U. Pettit, Member of Congress from the XIth District of Indiana, to Miss Brenton, daughter of the late Hon. Samuel Brenton.

A Queen's messenger left yesterday afternoon for New York, having in charge a young girl named Polydore, who has been brought from Utah by Judge Eckles, in obedience to instructions from the United States government. She was taken from England by her mother some years since, and her father prevailed upon the British authorities to make an application for her restoration. This has been complied with, and the girl was given to the British Minister here, who will have her sent home by the Africa, which will leave New York on Saturday. The mother of the girl, we understand, followed her to this city, and may endeavor to obtain possession of her.

"Perley" writes to the Boston Journal from Washington, the 5th:

"The 'Club House' fitted up by Mr. Pendleton just prior to his death, in what was Flint's Hotel, was formally opened last night. Engraved invitations were sent out to all gentlemen in society here, with members of 'the profession,' and at the bottom are the hours at which the table is to be spread during the winter. 'Dinner at 5; Supper at 10; Breakfast at 12.' From this it may be inferred that those who 'fight ye Tiger' will rise late in the day, and commence business operations early in the evening. The Roi des Cartes is Mr. Hall."

RECALL OF LORD NAPIER.

The London Morning Post (anti-ministerial organ) announces the recall of Lord Napier, and the promotion of Mr. Lyons from Florence to Washington. It says the assigned cause of his recall is Lord Napier's tendency in favor of the Monroe doctrine. The London Globe (anti-ministerial) confirms the report; but says that Lord Napier will have a European mission, the Government merely making the change in the regular course of diplomatic promotion, being perfectly satisfied with Lord Napier's course.

And the Herald (semi-officially) to the same effect: "We have authority for denying the accuracy of this statement. The probable removal of Lord Napier to a European post is not caused by any dissatisfaction on the part of the Government with his Lordship's opinions or conduct in the United States. His appointment to a European mission is in the regular course of diplomatic promotion; the zeal and ability which he has always shown in the performance of his public duty have entitled his Lordship to the best consideration of Her Majesty's Government."

It is understood that Lord Napier goes to Berlin, as the successor of Lord Bloomfield, who retires on a pension.

LORD NAPIER'S SUCCESSOR.

The successor of Lord Napier is to be Richard Pemell Bickerton Lyons, who, by the death of his father, the distinguished Admiral, has just become Baron Lyons. Lord Lyons is at present attaché to the legation at Florence, and entre-resident at Rome.

SENTENCE ON MONTALEMBERT.

Count de Montalembert has been convicted in Paris for his publication of a "Debate on the State of India in the British Parliament," and sentenced to 3000 francs fine and six months imprisonment, amidst great excitement.

HOW GRAND LADIES LIVE AT PARIS.

A Paris correspondent writes: "In Paris the season has fairly opened; but one great lady, one noble leader of fashion, is not there, and will not be. A northern clime has the honor of her birth, she is nearly connected with royalty itself, and a marriage with the son of one of France's greatest generals has acclimated her in Paris, where she has long shone as one of the brightest of the bright on the horizon of fashion. Alas! her glory is eclipsed. There was a time when a great lady did arrive from the north with plenty of rubles or florins and a noble name. Madame de —— received her with charming affability, introduced her to the world (of course the world comme il faut), and to the best dress-maker, the most fashionable jeweler, where, to secure Madame de ——'s guidance, was the sole, the great ambition of every new fragile bark launched in the maelstrom of Parisian life. But sublunary glory is perishable. Last winter certain unpleasant rumors began to circulate. 'What a beautiful dress you have here!' says Madame A to Madame B; 'it must have cost something.' 'I gave six hundred francs for it.' 'Why, that's dreadful! I have one of the same kind that cost me four hundred.' 'I bought mine from Madame de ——'s dress-maker.' 'What a pretty bonnet, Princess!' 'Indeed! you think so? It cost me one hundred and fifty francs.' 'Too dear by half.' 'I got it from Madame de ——'s milliner.'

"Such dialogues led to revelations; and here is the dénouement. This winter Madame de —— receives from the principal northern ladies of her acquaintance a score of letters, all composed in about the following terms, which are an authentic sample:

"'Dear Madame,—We are beginning to think of our fall toilets. Be so kind as to drop in during the morning; we shall agree on the stuffs and bonnets I need. You know I have every confidence in your exquisite taste. As heretofore, you will have the goodness to accept forty per cent. for your commission.

"'Believe me, dear Madame, etc.,

(Signed) "'Comtesse de ——'

"I give you this little story because it contains a moral which some of your lady readers who have shopped in Paris may recognize, and others who have yet that pleasure before them may need."

TWO GREAT PURCHASES.

"Paris is talking a good deal this week of two purchases. Count Duchatel has bought for his wife a ruby, a single ruby, for which he has paid $80,000, which makes her the mistress of the finest casket in Paris, except that enjoyed by the Empress—mind, I say enjoyed, for the Empress's casket does not belong to her, but to France. The Countess Duchatel's casket is worth a million of dollars. Monte Christo, the famous villa built and inhabited by Alexandre Dumas, has been again sold. None of its proprietors keep it long; they soon grow tired of it, perhaps because they are annoyed by visitors, or the arrangement of the house is inconvenient. Heaven only knows through how many (and what) hands it has passed since 1849, when the auctioneer entered it in the suite of the sheriff. The new landlord is Dr. Evans, the well known American dentist of the Rue de la Paix. Talk of sowing dragon's teeth to raise an army! That might do well enough for antiquity, which possessed neither the printing press, nor the electric telegraph, nor the steam-engine; but for modern times, which possess all of these and more wonders, the true magic is to pull out men's teeth; pull out enough, and you may raise armies, equip navies, and have the world at your feet."

AN AMERICAN EXHIBITION IN PARIS.

A correspondent of the Evening Post writes: "A want long felt by Americans visiting Paris is likely to be answered. With but a few days or weeks in Paris, the visitor finds it impossible to learn of the location of American artists, or, knowing it, to visit them, scattered as they are over this large city. It is proposed to establish a gallery in some central location, in which our artists can exhibit their pictures. Several resident Americans have generously offered to subscribe a sum sufficient to defray the preliminary expenses of this worthy object, and it bids fair to become one of the institutions of this city of attractions."

BOA CONSTRICTORS SWALLOWING BLANKETS.

The Jardin des Plantes has received from Cayenne a considerable cargo of boa constrictors; the largest is about two feet in diameter and thirty feet long; the day he was put in his cage he swallowed his blanket; the keeper saw him when the blanket was almost entirely swallowed, he took it by the end and pulled it out of his mouth. These beasts are torpid all day, but when night comes they hiss loudly, and the rattlesnakes ring their rattles with great noise.

ANOTHER PHILANTHROPIST PUNISHED.

The Paris Tribunal of Correctional Police has been engaged with some amusing cases. It has sentenced to a heavy fine a philanthropist who provided the natives of one of the suburbs of Paris with remedies for all their bodily and moral ailments. Like Dulcamara, he had an elisir d'amore—"to inspire love by magnetic attraction." He, however, told his customers that it would not act unless they kept their nails and teeth scrupulously clean. The benefactor of mankind was making a large income out of this specific when the police interfered.

BELGIUM.

A DINNER WITH THE KING.

The correspondent of the Washington States writes of a dinner at the palace at which he was a guest: "There were two American ladies present—one the wife of a Belgian diplomat, who used his diplomacy to win an American wife. She was in pink silk, trimmed with white lace, simply coiffed with pink flowers in her hair. The other is a friend of yours—the wife of the American Minister to the Belgian Court, Mrs. Fair, of Alabama. She wore a dress à la Pampadour, for the description of which I must refer you to the costumes of Louis XIV. All I can say of it is, that it was white, in some way trimmed with green, and one of the most striking novelties of the season. She was coiffed à la Mary Stuart, like the Duchess, with flowers so arranged that I could not tell whether they were natural or artificial. The tout ensemble was a masterly combination of simplicity and elegance, which defies all description, and which elicited several delicate and well-turned compliments from her partner in the dance, the heir-apparent to the throne, that, Ariel-like, I was enabled to overhear, and jot down in my memory for future use.

"I had the advantage of knowing Mrs. Fair before, but never had I seen her so radiant with beauty. At dinner she was seated between the King and the Prince, and smiled and chatted with both with an ease and graceful unconcern that made me think she had spent her life at courts. Shall I now tell you of the rich service, truly royal in its splendor of gold; of the two waiters to every guest; the different wines to each of the innumerable courses; the music of the King's band, celebrated over all Europe for its exquisite performance? I can but allude to all this, or my paper and your patience are fast giving out.

THE KING A LOVER OF THE AMERICANS.

"A few words only of the King. He is a most charming old man, full of graceful courtesy and an unaffected simplicity of manners—a perfect model of a citizen king—the chief magistrate of a free people. After dinner he conversed almost the whole evening with the American Minister, telling him how he trusted solely to the affections of the masses, with every part of which he came in daily contact; how he needed neither guards nor soldiers: and were it otherwise, he would not wish (!) to be a monarch for an hour. Gradually the two gentlemen grew merry; and one standing close and listening, without having the appearance, might have heard the American tell the other stories of a certain original judge, who, in times gone by, dealt out the law in rather a quaint fashion, in or near the capital of Alabama State.

"I may observe that, from the King downward, the whole of this nation profess the most sincere affection for the United States, whom they resemble in many points. At the dinner I speak of the American Minister and his wife had the place of honor, both in the drawing-room, at the table, and indeed were the only ones of the diplomatic corps invited. On all occasions the most marked distinction and courtesy has been shown them; and although this is in a great measure due to their personal popularity, yet a portion of it must be ascribed to the nation which they represent.

AN AMERICAN HEIRESS TO MARRY A BARON.

"As this is pre-eminently a gossiping letter, I shall wind up with a little bit of news, of which I am not at liberty to speak otherwise than in hints, and even that only in your ear of ears. A certain American heiress of immense wealth, and whilom a great Washington belle, quite a Ko-i-noor in priceless setting, a few days ago arrived in Brussels for the purpose of being married to an Austrian baron. The whole thing is as yet a secret, or supposed to be. The ceremony is to be performed first by a clergyman of the bride's persuasion, at the American Legation, and then by the Pope's nuncio at the hotel of the Austrian embassy. Now guess who can."

TURKEY.

A STORY OF THE HAREM.

A good story is told of the favorite Sultaness. The other day the Sultan sent her word by a eunuch that he was about to pay her a visit. "Has he got a pass to come from Riza Pacha?" she replied. Riza Pacha is, as you know, the minister charged with the reforms the Sultan is trying to introduce into his Court, and with whom the Harem is offended, because he curtails their extravagant expenditure of money.

THE JAFFA OUTRAGE.

A letter recently received by the Boston Journal, from Beirut, dated October 29, says:

"The fifth and last murderer implicated in the Jaffa outrage, captured at Nablores, on being brought to Beirut, and his case examined into, proved not to be the real murderer. The governor of Haifa, who allowed the real man to escape, is himself now in surveillance here, and will be kept so till the real murderer be forthcoming.

"The United States frigate Wabash arrived here on the 26th, and is now at anchor in our roads. Several American ladies visited her, and while yet on board they were somewhat startled by the firing of a salute in honor of the Pasha, then leaving the ship. She is to sail soon, and the Macedonian will take her place, and remain on the coast till the Jaffa outrage is settled."

A postscript, dated November 1, adds:

"The Wabash leaves to-day for Tripoli and Jaffa."

TORTURE AND HOMICIDE IN AN AMERICAN STATE PRISON.

VIEW OF THE STATE PRISON AT AUBURN, NEW YORK.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY E. P. SENTER.]

WE need no longer, it seems, travel to China or Japan for illustrations of torture. A visit to our own penitentiaries and prisons will furnish all the horrors that the most curious appetite can desire.

A year ago we published an account of the poor-houses of this State. Our account was derived from the Report of a Legislative Committee. It showed, in brief, that, as a general rule, paupers and other inmates of State benevolent institutions were not properly fed; that they were not adequately protected against the cold; that the sexes herded together promiscuously at night; and that, in many instances, poor wretched idiots, half-starved and ill-clad, had actually frozen to death in their cells in State institutions.

We now present a far more fearful picture of the mismanagement of our public institutions for the confinement and correction of criminals. On 24 inst. a convict named More, imprisoned in the State Prison at Auburn, was showered to death by the prison officials. The circumstances of the case are simply as follows:

The convict, More, was a negro. He is certified to have been a man of naturally pleasant temper, but violent when crossed. On 1st inst. he was said to have been in a bad humor; he was seen, or is said to have been seen, to sharpen a knife, and to mutter threats against some one; on the strength of which he was, on 2d inst., seized by several keepers or deputy-keepers of the State Prison, and by them dragged toward the shower-bath for punishment. It seems that he stood in dire dread of the shower-bath. Like most negroes, he entertained a lively fear of cold. He knew that the water of the shower-bath would be very cold indeed; and, after vainly appealing to the feelings of his captors to release him, he broke away from them and fled—be it remarked—to the shop where he was in the habit of working. At the door of the shop a convict arrested him; a keeper and his assistants swiftly followed; he was dragged by main force, and after many violent struggles, to the shower-bath; all the water that was in the tank—amounting to from three to five barrels, the quantity is uncertain—was showered upon him in spite of his piteous cries; a few minutes after his release from the bath he fell prostrate, was carried to his cell, and died in five minutes.

It is this homicide which we this week illustrate.

The use of the shower-bath as a means of coercing criminals into submission to the orders of prison authorities began to be general about the year 1845. In that year a convict at the Auburn State Prison was whipped by order of competent authority, and died under the lash. The public indignation which was aroused by the event led to the abolition of whipping as a punishment in the prisons of the State of New York. It was preserved in other States, as, for instance, in Connecticut, in which State Prison wardens are authorized to this day to administer stripes—not over ten in number—to refractory prisoners. But in New York the cat was disused, and the shower-bath reigned in its stead.

This bath varies in the several penal establishments of this State. In some the culprit stands, and receives the shower in a standing position. In others, as at Auburn, he sits in a chair which reminds one of the old "stocks." His legs and arms are pinioned: his neck fits into a sort of dish, which closes tightly round his throat. As soon as he is fastened therein, a cloth is put into the dish to prevent the water escaping too fast. The string is then pulled, and the stream falls. If the convict does not keep his head well erect, with his mouth as high above water as his position will allow, he will suffocate. Indeed his attitude and the machine are such that he feels perpetually in imminent danger of suffocation. The consequence is that his sole thought while he is under the shower is to keep his mouth and nose above water; and the agony of this effort is aggravated by the fact that his neck, feet, and arms are tightly pinioned. Our illustration will enable the reader to judge of the feelings of the culprit who is adjudged to endure this penalty.

Of course, the severity of the shower-bath as a penal method is proportioned to the character of the victim and the season of the year. In August a shower-bath is no great hardship to a white person, though to a negro accustomed to tropical heat it may be less pleasant. In November no one cares about being placed under a fall of water for many minutes; and least of all a negro, who is far less capable of bearing intense cold than a person of the white race. Very few white men, however robust, would be able to endure a ten minutes' flow of ice-cold water at the present season. The negro More, it seems, was subjected to an incessant stream of water at 32° Fahrenheit for half an hour. It is no matter of wonder that he died after.

It is clear that some coercive methods must be employed in prisons to reduce culprits to subordination; though, of course, nothing can justify their being murdered by angry keepers. We give illustrations of the various methods which are at present employed in the Auburn and other State prisons for the subjugation of refractory convicts.

One is the pulley. This instrument of torture consists of a system of pulleys connected with rings, which are attached to the wrists of the culprit and to one of his ankles, so that so long as he is under the process his whole weight rests on one leg; the sensation of having his arms raised above his head becomes after a time excessively painful; and, if the punishment be prolonged, it becomes almost intolerable.

Another method of punishment is bucking. This has long been in use among the negroes in tropical countries. It consists in fastening the hands tightly, passing them over the knees, and thrusting a stout stick between the inside of the knees and the arms. Thus spitted, the convict is helpless, and may be relied about hither or thither, as his rulers please. No evil consequences have ever been known to flow from this punishment.

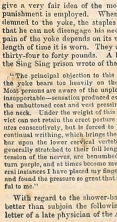
Another penalty used at the Auburn State Prison is the crown. This is a simple helmet of metal, which is worn over the head. It is suspended by pain, and is rather a badge of disgrace than a method of torture. It may be compared to the fool's cap which is in use in most of our schools.



The yoke is a bar of iron four or five inches wide, and from five to six feet in length, with a staple at either end to fasten the wrists, and one in the centre to encircle the neck. Our engraving will give a very fair idea of the mode in which this punishment is employed. When a culprit is condemned to the yoke, the staples are tightened so that he can not disengage his neck or hands. The pain of the yoke depends on its weight and on the length of time it is worn. They usually vary from thirty-four to forty pounds. A late physician of the Sing Sing prison wrote of the yoke:

"The principal objection to this punishment is that the yoke bears too heavily on the cervical vertebræ. Most persons are aware of the unpleasant—and, in fact, insupportable—sensation produced even by the weight of the embattened coat and vest pressing upon the back of the neck. Under the weight of this instrument the convict can not retain the erect posture for even a few minutes consecutively, but is forced to bend forward in his continual writhing, which brings the entire weight of the bar upon the lower cervical vertebræ. The arms are generally stretched to their full length, and, from steady tension of the nerves, are benumbed; while the hands turn purple, and at times become much swollen. In several instances I have placed my fingers beneath the yoke, and found the pressure so great that it was actually painful to me."

With regard to the shower-bath, we can not do better than subjoin the following extract from a letter of a late physician of the Auburn State prison, addressed to a Select Committee of the New York State Assembly of 1851:

"The form of the shower-bath is that of the common sticks, with a reservoir of water above it, having a head of fifty-four inches, measuring from the surface of the water to the perforated plate at the end of the discharging-tube. The offender, being stripped of his clothing, is placed in a sitting posture in the stocks, with feet and hands securely fastened, and his head contained in a sort of hopper, the bottom of which encircles his neck so closely that the water will not run off as fast as it can be let on, the water being under the control of the keeper by means of a cord attached to a valve in the bottom of the reservoir. From the perforated plate the water falls about eighteen inches, when it strikes the head of the convict, immediately fixed, thence passing over the whole surface of the body. When the reservoir is full, the force of the blow upon the head is nearly equal to a column of water seventy-two inches in height. This force is somewhat reduced by the intervention of the perforated plate—a late modification in the instrument.

"To the mechanic, who calculates the influence of mere matter upon matter, the power of this column of water must possess considerable importance. But to the physiologist, who can alone judge with any degree of correctness of the influence of a stream, generally at 32° Fahrenheit, falling upon the head and thence covering the whole body, the suffering induced, and danger incurred, must appear monstrous in the extreme.

EXTERIOR OF A CONVICT'S CELL.

"In an essay on the employment of water in surgery, by Alphonse Auguste Amussat, of Paris, translated by Professor Frank H. H. Hamilton, Buffalo University, there are some applicable remarks on the physiological effects of water.

"'The application of cold water,' he says, 'especially in winter, produces horripilations and shiverings, which continue more or less time. I have lately seen, in one of the hospitals of Paris, a man who had his hand crushed. The surgeon, after having amputated two fingers, submitted the hand to continued irrigations of cold water. The patient assured me that during eight days he experienced constant chills, despite all the means employed to keep him warm.

"'Issues says he saw a female with whom a superficial burn seemed to indicate cool applications, and who was seized with tetanus soon after their use had been commenced.

"'Gouraud reports a case of Guyenot's, in which, having been applied an hour or two upon a strangulated hernia, the hernia was reduced, and the surgeon, obliged to return to an operation, found the opinions frozen.

"'Who will affirm,' says Mr. Earle, 'that the application of a powerful refrigerent upon a large surface will not, by repelling inward upon the viscera the blood which originally abounded upon the diseased part—and I may add on the surface of the body—occasion congestions, and give birth to those complications to which I have alluded? The facts are every where to be seen, and the practitioner ought to profit by them.'

"'I have collected,' says Amussat, 'also several cases of patients who, having been submitted to irrigations with cold water, have suddenly died with tetanic nervous malady.'

"These extracts are made to show how powerful and even dangerous the effects of cold water upon the system are, even when employed by the most experienced hands.

"Most convicts have great dread of this mode of punishment, but as the emotion of fear to the unreflecting mind presents little or no barrier to the commission of crimes having their origin in the emotions, it does not prevent a violation of rules which are in opposition to the instincts; still, when the offender sees the penalty with no hope of escape, this most depressing of the passions augments the danger to which he is about to be exposed. This psychological effect is at once seen and realized, unis before entering the sticks, and a pallor as deathlike is induced, that the officer on duty dares not subject the offender to this ordeal. There, in one instance, heard the convict scarcely breathe for the keeper not to make him an immediate. Who is able to comprehend the condition of mind under such circumstances?

"To illustrate the effects of this mode of punishment, I will cite a few instances.

"Convict number 8502, aged about thirty years, of sanguine nervous temperament, was brought to the hospital in a perfect unconscious state, and with convulsive twitchings of the muscles. His mouth filled with frothy saliva, no perceptible pulsations in the radial artery, but little external heat, and very imperfect respiration. Stimulants were administered, as I was credibly informed, with about two gills of cold water. His body was rubbed with stimulants and warmly covered with blankets. In about two hours, deglutition was partly restored, when brandy and other stimulants were administered. In four hours after entering the hospital his consciousness returned.

"This individual was on nearly destroyed that he had passed into a state of coma, quiet mental state that immediately preceded death by drowning. He said, that at last he had this delightful sensation of falling, and then it was all over. He suffered from cramps in his lower extremities for about three months after.

"In this case the entire inability of the keeper to judge of the potency of the punishment was peculiarly manifest. The convict, who was in good health and spirits, presented to him no objection to its application. In matters within his comprehension, this keeper had good judgment, and, whilst, was of a humane disposition, but of either his temperament or idiosyncrasy of the convict he knew nothing, and consequently was incapable of wielding judiciously a means so powerful.

"In my presence, convict number 6495 was shower-ed with one and a half barrels of water. During the operation the muscles of the chest and abdomen were severely exercised. When taken out of the sticks, his skin was cold and shrivelled; there was no perceptible pulsation in the temporal or radial arteries, and he complained of severe cephalalgy. He was shower-ed as long as the officer on duty dared to continue it. He made no acknowledgment of his fault, and, in my opinion, would not have concluded to do so still it was too late to be able to accomplish it. This convict possessed a nervous bilious temperament, which is known to resist to the utmost every means employed to render its possessor subservient to the will of others.

"In this instance the keeper did not desist from any unfavorable appearances, but because, as he remarked, he had applied as much water as he thought safe. To the physiologist, however, the physical condition thus induced must appear to be of the most serious character. That the punishment here continued much longer, there would, in all probability, have resulted organic lesion from internal congestion.

"Convict number 8502 was showered with two and a half barrels of water. This punishment I did not witness, but from the observation of the keeper, that 'the water was off him as it would from a duck, without his feeling it.' I was induced to interrogate the convict myself. To my surprise, he replied that he would have died before acknowledging any thing. He said the water made his head ache; that he felt cold, and that his flesh had the sensation of being asleep. His temperament was nervous bilious, the bilious predominating.

"Convict number 4565, aged 38 years, of sanguine nervous temperament, and in good health, was showered with three pails of cold water. He was taken from the sticks in convulsions, which lasted about thirty minutes, when he was conveyed to the hospital. When I saw him, about an hour afterward, he had evidence of the brain, accompanied with severe cephalalgy; was laboring under great derangement of mind, and mentioned his belief that he had transpired. He said he had been struck on his head, but there were no external signs of violence. He was bled thirty ounces, and took a cathartic potion. The venesection partly relieved the pain, but not the derangement. The cathartic operated freely, and on the following morning his mind was apparently clear, but his head still ached. He said he felt as though his head was 'bound with a band of iron.' Under the use of blisters, after several days, the pain and constriction gradually subsided.

"Convict number 4189 was showered previous to my connection with the Prison. He told me that while in the stocks 'his head ached as though it would certainly be split open,' and as it suddenly stopped, and he felt quite easy. He came out of the stocks as one lame feels no more pain. Instantly he came to comfort his mind, hopelessly incurable, though at times he comforts it understandingly about the punishment.

The cricket number 5669 was showered with six pails of water, discharged on his head in a half inch stream. Shortly after he fell into convulsions, from which he emerged with a mind totally deafroyed. He was pardoned in twelve months afterwards, and a report subsequently reached the prison that he did not long survive his liberty. The foregoing probably is an exaggeration with the prison.

"Cowfair number 5668, seventeen years old, and of lymphatic temperament, was showered with three barrels of water, which, as usual, in the effect, as the number before, which shows how unwise it is, as a means of punishment, in many cases.

"The instances I have selected for your reflection are the extremes of surgery overdone—but, seven, nevertheless, they go to show how inappropriate it is to place this punishment in hands totally inadequate to its comprehension.

"In the recent repetition of the shower-bath—I was informed by an officer who for several years had acquired more information in regard to the effects on the personal observation than any other individual in the prison—under the crowbar lock alive to resist its infliction, and that several applications to a powerful current or caution is to use."

In spite of what honest the shower-bath has continued to be commonly employed in our prisons, as well at Sing-Sing as at Auburn. At the latter the prison a hose is occasionally substituted for the shower; and it has at times been applied so closely to the face of the patient that, simultaneously with the flow of water upon the face, blood has gushed from the nose, ears, and mouth, and has been it is believed the bone has not been used. At the same time it is quite clear that, under certain circumstances, the dread of ice-cold water through the pores of a shower-bath may prove even more fatal than a shot from a bow.

It is not upon a man in a perspiration, as was the case with the negro More, who had just fought might and main with his keepers, that a shower of ice-cold water could not but be highly dangerous.

Mr. Shilney, the experienced warden of Wight's Island, who has been upward of thirty years engaged in the administration of prisons in this section of country, has been heard to declare that he has never found it necessary to administer any corporeal punishment whatever to his convicts. He is believed that he regards the cat, under proper guidance, as the wholesomest instrument of correction, but he has never needed even that ally; and it must be admitted that he has had more experience than any of our prison managers.

The chief error in the management of our State prisons arises from the liberty which subordinates enjoy in the matter of punishments. Subordinate prison officials are appointed on political grounds by Prison Inspectors, themselves creatures of party political conventions. They are seldom men of character, experience, or education. Not unfrequently they are jail birds, who have acquired their claim to their appointments by shoulder-hitting. The late Secretary of Auburn appears to be a natural result of this system. The man More was murdered simply because the punishment he endured was inflicted by ignorant and unskilled subordinates without prison discipline, and were animated more by vengeance than by the philosophical desire to have the prison regulations carried out. They killed him because he resisted and struggled for his threatened life. The judicious warden would have subdued him without difficulty.

All that remains now to be done is the duty of the District Attorney. An inquest has been held on the body of the negro. Eight men constitute the jury, six of whom are said to have been prison contractors. They refused to allow the prison physician to deliver his evidence, as he wished; and found the absurd verdict that the man's death had been "hastened" by the use of the shower-bath. It is clear that if any notice is to be taken of this poor creature's death the District Attorney must move in the matter. It remains to be seen whether he will do so; or whether the civilization of the State of New York is to be disgraced by the torture and homicide, by State officials, of a poor convict in a State prison.

With such sublime and happy views of themselves and their belongings the sisters could not fail to be maximally amiable; apart from a stolid existence in the elder, and a craving selfishness in the younger, they were amiable. They were very peaceable wives in a house, but then they ruled and their husbands obeyed. This was the congial arrangement under the circumstances.

Ellen Ashton was the only survival she was two-and-twenty; a woman without romance, without tenderness, without gewsiality, sympathy, or anything else but that cold quality which are the vital breath of domestic life. A man might almost as well take a cucumber to wife as such a being as this animated clay for a wife. Mr. Percival Meakin was not a great character, but he had enough of the leaven of manhood in him to experience a considerable annoyance from Cecily's coldness and her sister's indifference. The selfishness and system, by her care of her father, and her pride of station, and though not in love, he thought she would make a suitable partner. He was disappointed; but a few failures convinced him of the fruitlessness of attempting to work any change in her, so he retook himself to field pursuits, and went often from home, while she droned on her placid, half-contented round of life at Hardington, neither receiving nor paying visits when they could be avoided.

Mr. and Mrs. Cholmondeley Monke's life was not unlike that led by Cecily and her husband, at least in its monotony, perhaps under pressure of boredom, perhaps from more vivacity of temper in the wife than Mr. Cholmondeley's, there got into certain excesses which speedily cramped the revenues of Frophsbourne. Cecily, indignant that Eliza had not provided for her spouse better, refused to receive either of them at Hardington, and was glad to find a reasonable excuse for doing so in her when they forsook the Fens and went to live abroad.

For several years neither sister bore children, but, at last, Eliza wrote to announce a daughter and in reply Cecily sent word that, three months before, she had blessed Hardington with a son and heir.

CHAPTER II.

THE HEIR OF HARDINGTON. Lord of the Manor of Hardington, Godfather George Percival Monke, Lord of the Manor of Hardington.

Such was his superscription of the wizened, monkey-faced boy she had brought into the world. Never "my baby," "my poor little weakling baby," never "Cecily, for pity's sake be pride, or delight," but always Heir of Hardington, Lord of the Manor of Hardington,—representative of so many acres and so much money, and so many neglected responsibilities.

Poor little Godfather George Percival Monke! How he was doctored, and iron-framed, and nonsine-tanted, flagellated, and goaded and spurred, bolstered, and hypnised! No baby of any sagacity but would have made haste to die under such ordeal, rather than be preserved to the inheritance of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. But George, being a baby, and a boy, lived through it, and at twelve years old was about as foolish, as conceited, and as helpless a lad as the town of Monke ever produced. By that time he had outgrown the iron frame, and could walk straight on his own legs, and could also repeat every particular of the estate he was to inherit: tell you its value under the old leases, and what it might be made to produce under the new leases now in; and also he could exact reverence to himself from tenant and servant as their master in embryo. His father said he was a fool.

There was a grain of good in him, of course, as there is in everything God-planted, until the sin-blown tares of the world spring up to choke it. Poor George! he was to be more sorry to see pain; he was kind to animals; he was not ungenerous; and he worshipped his mother. She never caressed him without reduplicating him. "You ought to do this," "You must learn to do that," "Such and such things become you and your rank," were the speeches constantly on her lips, though never accompanied with an incitement to any high or noble rule of life. If she had lost him she would have grieved for him as the lost heir of Hardington, but as the one child whose birth-pangs had almost cost her life.

She thought him her notion of the duties of property, and so it was; but her notion was low to put most money out of it, and how to put the least into the hands of the servants and tenants, steadily acted. For him there was a sermon in each stone of the village of Hardington—a village not pretty by any means, ill-ordered, nor well-situated, nor well-manured, but still quite good enough for Mrs. Percival Meakin so long as the cottagers were punctual with their rent.

CHAPTER III.

THERE is no knowing into what depths of stultified folly the lad might have meandered but for a little circumstance that befell him when he was about sixteen. He was riding an ill-broken pony through the village of Grenside, when it took fright and ran away with him, kicked him, and broke his arm. The youth was picked up and carried into the house of the curate of the parish, whose wife put him to bed, and sent for his mother and the doctor. The doctor came and set the limb, and his mother came to nurse him; but finding her own comforts restricted in the curate's abode, she soon left him to recover without her attendance. She acted all-justly; Francis George could not have been in better hands.

Mr. Proby was a plain, steady-going, worthy clergyman, and his wife was an excellent woman; a woman of talent and education, of enthusiasm and genuine warm-heartedness. Curate-like, Mr. Proby had a house full of children—hearty, noisy, generous, mischievous boys, and laughter-loving, pretty girls, all the family more than struggling; but Katie was a real beauty, a copy of her mother —nearly; if not quite, as handsome as her mother had been at the same age. There was no nonsense about Katie—no silly affectation of boyishness, no still sillier affectation of premature womanliness. She was a thorough girl—tall, slight, agile—as graceful as a gazelle, and as good a climber, skipper, and general play-fellow as brothers could wish for; and yet she was an adept at needle, a good nurse, a fair housekeeper, a scholar, and a sympathising companion to every body. A great part of the attendance upon Francis George fell to Katie and she took to it with a cheerful alacrity and kindness all her own.

There was not much about the young gentleman to attract liking; he did not become a favorite in the house with any body; unless, perhaps, Katie's dog, then dubbed him, in fact; and even their mother, kind as she was, found him too exacting and impatient of contradiction to be civil to. Illness necessary: so, as soon as he was sufficiently recovered to return home, he was not pressed to stay longer. Every one was glad to get him rather gladly than otherwise—Katie included.

Francis George went to Hardington as a return to polite regions. Francis George missed something. He missed the handsome face of a woman who had surrounded the curate's hearth, and made his family as one; he missed the cheerful voices and laughter and, indeed, all he missed was Katie's and the good-humored attentions. His mother was like a machine, after Katie's departure. Francis George tried to thaw her by telling her stories of the ways and customs of the curate's house; but Mrs. Percival Meakin was not to be thawed, and was gruffies at Hardington gate by breathing on them as to thaw her by any such process. She became more and more impatient of any allusion to the friends, and told him that his gratitude was absurdly overestimated.

Yes; Francis George had a fund of obstinate, pertinacious, unforgetting gratitude in his disposition, which he strongly acquired from Katie. It was the nearest approach to any decided virtue that he had ever displayed. Mr. Proby's father and mother insisted on compensating Mrs. Proby for the trouble and expense of their son's recovery, but Francis George could not be persuaded to forget Katie as a canceling of his debt. He turned his pony's head towards Grenside nearly every day he rejoined after the health of the Probys, as if, instead of being a hardy race, they were a family of chronic invalids. He contrived to go out to the grey hardington, to answer his questions and receive his messages; and when Katie left home to visit on his fine and a nervous stammer in his voice, he told her he had brought her a little present.

"I thought you had let my mother know; but I spent all my quarter over it," said he, in a hurried whisper, trying to put a necklace into her hot hands; but Katie, clasping those little members behind her back, shook her head in a resolute way, which he could not accept positively, for his pugna would not like it—especially if Mrs. Percival Meakin did not know.

"Oh! but do, Katie! I should never have bought it but for you. It is a watch and chain." Katie shook her head more determinedly. "In the first place, it had cost him an immense effort of self-denial to make the purchase at all; and in the second, he had been full a month in raising up his courage to offer it. It was cruel indeed to reject it; and he "Do, Katie!" was so entreating.

"No, no, no!" she replied; "you ought not to have spent your money in such a foolish way."

"It is not foolish. Look here, Katie! I like you better than any body in the world, except my mother; that is to say, I love you best."

Katie ran away laughing, with her hands over her ears, and was soon called to her to stop, the more she would not.

"Katie, if you won't have it I'll throw it into the road!" he cried at last; and as she still paid no heed, he turned round toward home, and was out of sight of the house in a minute.

For more than a week after this rebuff he did not appear at Grenside at all. He was apparently disappointed that Katie would not accept the gift. She had told her mother the whole story—the threat included—and Mrs. Proby included—and her mother had he would be so wild as to put it in execution; so that, when one of the Proby boys came home excitant, with the enormous case in his hand, proclaiming that he had found it among the long reeds by the brook, they were unfeignedly surprised. They had not given Francis George credit for so much spirit, and both of them liked him the better for the added spirit amongst them. Katie, in her father's orders, even wrote him a kind little letter, when the watch was sent back to him.

The next day he came to see them again, making no allusion either to the watch or to his long absence, and then regularly resumed his old with active constancy. The Probys, one and all, were very kind to him; but with the foolish prejudice he used to make about his property, his dignity, and himself! How he did bore poor Katie and her mother with their watch-table, when he tangled every red, and disordered every box and basket into confusion in his search. He had a stupid trier at home, who taught him a little Latin and Greek, but left him as ignorant of commonplace matters as a magpie or a Hindoo. Katie had not asked him where America was, whether it was hard or water or cream-cheese, he could not have told you.

It was an awful shock to the heir of Hardington when, a long time after, he offered his hand, his heart, and his futurity to the poor curate's daughter, and was refused. He was in real, hard earnest, poor long-limbed, feeble-minded fellow; and when Katie blushed rather angrily, and said "No," with unmistakable tone, he could not clearly came into his eyes.

"I thought you liked me, Katie; haven't I been coming here for years? You don't know, I can't tell you how fond I am of you? I'd do any thing for you, Kathy—that I would! My own sweetheart I would, 'spluttered he, with frightful energy.

"I'm so sorry, Francis George, I am so very sorry," replied Katie, a little frightened and subdued.

"It is of no use to be sorry; if you don't like me, you can't help it, and I don't care what becomes of me if you don't. But it is too bad. I could not have believed it!" This anti-climax to his emotion almost made Katie smile; but, checking the impulse, she replied, that she was very unwilling to be, and left her discomfited suitor alone.

Francis George Percival Monke was only nineteen when he thus exhibited himself, and had never felt his mother's sprus-strings for a single day.

CHAPTER IV.

MR. AND MRS. CROSSCONFLUX MONKE continued to reside abroad, for or less dissatisfied with their daughter was of an age to be introduced into society, and then they brought her home, to England, and, at her aunt's invitation, to Hardington. The two sisters had made a compact for the reunion of their family, by marrying one to their children; and each was formally told of this compact before they met. The elder Miss George received the announcement in solemn silence, and Flora received it with an expressive giggle and a hope that her cousin was handsome and witty, and not unopish, like so many of the English gentlemen she had seen abroad.

Flora Monke had no hereditary right to be pretty, but she was pretty, even beautiful; and her fortune and expectations gave her the use of a much prettier than she was. Her aunt received her with such gratulation, and her cousin George received her a stolid composure which did not promise any keen susceptibility to her charms. She was piqued, and told her mother that he was dull.

If Flora expected to be courted, and flattered, and worshipped by her cousin, she must have been disappointed, for he kept as much out of her way as ever he could, and never said a civil thing to her; a peculiarity for which his mother made up by the task she morning when they were alone. She still treated her son as authoritatively as when he was a boy in tunics.

"Francis George, you are a dull wooer," she said, with slow sarcasm, "if Miss George received your proof of you."

"I don't like Flora," replied Francis George, gravely.

"But you must learn to like her, since she is to be your wife!"

"Mother, if Flora Monke was the only woman left in the world I would not marry her. I don't like her."

Mrs. Percival Monke grew red all over her dull gray face. The tone in which her son made assertion and contradiction she had ever heard from her son since he was very small; and he had grown so that she could not have looked more indignant or surprised.

"Francis George Percival Monke!" she cried, with strangling, choking dignity, "do you know who I am and who you are?"

The young man spoke vividly at her awful voice, but the stolid resolution of his visage did not relax a muscle. He was to be full as obstinate as his mother, and when they had come to a pass like —when each was equally determined—then began the tug of war.

"Yes, mother; I am heir of Hardington, lord of the manor of Hardington," said he, in that formula which had been dinned into his ears since he made his mother laugh; for, at this moment, it sounded ridiculous enough.

"Deplume you of those distinctions, Sir, and do you know what you are then?" said she, bitterly.

"My father says I am a fool," replied Francis George; "other people are of a like opinion—"

"Not such a fool as they take you to be," said his mother. "You have as much sense as nine men in ten if you will use it, and you must use it now in contending your self-willed opinion with your cousin Flora. I say you shall marry her—and soon, too!"

"And I say I will not! I am almost of age, and I shall be my own master in that matter at least."

The young man spoke quietly but firmly. His mother, looking up at his face, felt herself in a contrarity slipping from her grasp. Her weak, awkward, foolish boy was, as it were, become a man by magic. There he stood calmly, doggedly, obstinate but sinewy, a face far from vacuous; expressive, indeed, of a brute courage and obstinacy which, being provoked, would never slumber again. But for his foolish training he would have been a fine young man; as it was, he had been wise enough to inform that mass of matter. The old habit of love and fear of his mother were strong upon him yet; she saw it, and hoped to triumph still.

"You ought to be glad that Flora will have you," she said, "and you ought to have a pleasure in reuniting our disseverel property. If you do not marry Flora, you may be your own master, but you shall not be master of any thing else while I live, and when I die you shall have nothing but the bare estate; that I promise you."

"I don't care for Hardington. I don't see any good it has ever done either you or my father or me. I think it is a miserable place," replied Francis George, in perfect good faith.

His mother's eyes fixed him as if she thought him a maniac in a dangerous mood.

"Will you be pleased to explain yourself, if you are not raving; which I only suspect," said she, fiercely.

"Why, mother, what good has it done us or any body?" persisted he her. "My father is always away in London, and hates it. You sit at work all day as hard as if you worked for bread, and nobody comes near you; and, instead of it, you only make me marry a girl I don't love. Then there's the village. Such dirty old houses and people, and no schools. If we were paupers instead of people of ten thousand a year we could not have a greater heap of misery outside the gates than we have. What is the object of the Hardington money if we don't spend it? I say again, I don't care for Hardington. Mr. Prosby's sons are better off than I am; because they have been well brought up and they have got professions. When I am among fellows of my age I feel like a fool, and I am a fool."

That is a fact beyond doubt," replied his mother, dryly. "I am glad that you have come over decrying Hardington—you shall leave it—you shall have a profession."

"I'll not! I'll not! I'll not! I've said I shall be an idle gentleman no longer!"

There was a disagreeable tone in this threat which made Flora look up from her work and all over. It was a rather critical act of his, this sudden changing of the leading subject to that which had walked so long and humbly. He felt vexed, too, in a stupid sort of way, at having vexed his mother, and was glad that Flora had made a timely concession when Flora came into the room—Flora in a gay morning dress, and looking pretty as a maiden to attract a man's fancy, most people would have thought, but, as it seemed, not the star that could guide Francis George.

"Flora, our young gentleman takes umbrage at the gifts of fortune, and despises them—bronze, is he not?" said Mrs. Percival Monke.

Flora glanced from one to the other with a puzzled air, and concluded that was the moment for Francis George went out and left his mother to explain the little or no amount of information which, in consequence of her explanation was, that the Hardington Monkes and the Crossconfluxe Monkes separated oddly the next day, and that Flora's precocious her first campaign in town. Francis George had told nine where she was to go, as he was no more trouble with her airs and graces.

CHAPTER V.

THE lawyer who managed the business affairs of the Monkes was Mr. Leatherhead; a dry, cleverish, retiring gentleman old fellow, who greatly aped the elder of the co-heiresses' style of saving and managing her property. He said she had a brain of an acute sort of his own, and, in fact, it was a pity her son was so little like her. He thought he was a simpleton; but you see, for a man of varied experience, was extremely astonished when he received from her the following letter:

"HARDINGTON MANOR, Oct. 31st, 1851.

"SIR,—I am sure you will hear me your valuable assistance in a private matter. I am in a difficulty at heart. He is bitten by some of those radical views for the regeneration of society, which are sometimes written by in every quarter, and I think a year's confinement in your office may tend more toward his cure than all the preaching in the world. Make him your pupil, your clerk, and show him no respect or distinction, as that would only serve to make him more self-conceited. I mean from me than a clerk's salary at a low rate, and I should wish to secure your services for a year. Therefore the more likely is he to become sensible of his folly in his fancied philanthropic views, and to see that I will be given them up. I quite renounce him. He will be to you, and if you do not, I shall.

"Yours, etc., CECILY P. MONKE."

"Ah! she has commenced the wedged end of it!" Miss Cecily's plan for uniting Hardington and Frogholmes has gone off—that's the true interpretation of this document. What'ye'ye want with me? Well! I suppose I must try to humor both."

Thus it was that Francis George Percival Monke, heir of Hardington, lord of the manor of Hardington, became a lawyer's clerk. His mother thought he would soon sicken of such indigious work; but Leatherhead's sedentary work; but, contrary to her expectations, he took to it kindly, and accommodated himself to his new position with cheerfulness and alacrity. He made a friend among his fellow-clerks in the person of Mr. Prosby's eldest, and the pair took rooms in the same house, and lived together in great amity.

"Francis George is no fool!" said old Leatherhead to himself. "He is a better fellow, and a more sensible fellow than I ever thought him. He is at that silly mother of his who has had her own will so many years that she has lost her judgment."

Yes. Francis George began to develop a plain, useful kind of ability; he had no genius, but he had conscientiousness, and a sort of unpretending honesty of purpose. He had grown painfully sensible of his deficiencies, and was making laudable use to see with what diligence he strove to repair these in his leisure evenings. The manuals of popular information that he read, the facts and facts that he committed to memory, the instructive lectures that he attended, gave beyond the calculation of his biographer. Odds and ends of his undigested miscellaneous knowledge were continually bursting from him, like sparks from a new pill rag-bag, to the sly and secret amusement of his companions, who, in return, gave him a laugh at him outright; for his good temper made him liked, and his romantic circumstances made him interesting.

For six months he remained in the lawyer's office, generally improving both in mind and manner, as the conceit of himself was rubbed out of him by constant contact with other young fellows wiser and better than he. Then his mother made a proposition to him, whether he was willing to accede to his father's object in sending him to London. George had not tasted the sweets of liberty in vain; he wrote an affectionately respectful letter to his mother, telling her he spent a double number of hours on which decision his father secretly upheld him. Mrs. Percival Monke, in her turn, received her hasty banishment of her son, and would have been glad to recall him on almost any terms; but she was much too tenacious of her maternal authority to stoop to him and say so, therefore the breach between them widened. The sudden marriage of Flora Monke with a penniless ensign, utterly overthrowing her design for the reunion of Hardington and Frogholmes, exasperated her still more against her son; and, in the first bitterness of her disappointment, she inclined to have him home again.

"HARDINGTON, March 18, 18—.

"FRANCIS GEORGE.—You must have heard of your cousin Flora's elopement with Frederick Stubbs: then you can sufficiently see what a fool you have been. I throw you off entirely now. You have acted the part of an undutiful and ungrateful son. You have taken from me the sole object for which I lived. Hardington and Frogholmes can never be one; and you, cruel, indifferent, wicked, unworthy boy, are the sole cause. You need not write to me, and you are now aware of your ill-regulated notions of affection: I believe in deeds, not in words. I can think of but one more reason for writing to you. You do not have Hardington when I die: but while I live, not a single sixpence shall you have. You may live anywhere and how you can; and the worst wish I wish you is, that you may have children of your own, they may bring you dearer feelings than generally as you have wrung mine. And so, I remain,

"Your injured and aggrieved mother,

"CECILY PERCIVAL MONKE."

Francis George showed the letter to his father who only shrugged his shoulders, and wished his wife would give him his full discharge from Hardington, that, being without corralling his neighbors but the young man dutifully endeavored to soften her feelings toward him, and his failure was not chargeable on him.

Woman's a riddle, indeed!" cried old Leatherhead, when the letter was wrote to him that she should henceforward stop her son's allowance, and that he must maintain his own independently of her. "Woman's not always a pleasant riddle!"

Francis George would have had no difficulty in doing so, for his expectations had so been so disposed; but, as old Leatherhead advised him not, and very wisely, to make any change, he remained without difficulty to his fate; resigned himself all the more readily, because Mr. Crispy had got a client for a few miles from town, and had brought his family to reside there. Willie went down every Saturday and visited until Monday, and Francis George always made him discourse about his father and mother, his sisters and brothers, when Willie was back, until Willie was tired of the subject.

"Come down, and see them yourself. I'm sure you will be welcome," Willie suggested, one day; and without any more formal invitation Francis George went.

CHAPTER VII.

WILLINGHAM PARSONAGE was a pretty spot, quite rural, though almost within sight of London smoke, and the young Prosbys flourished there quite as well as they had ever done in the wilds of Yorkshire—indeed better. Katie happened to be in the garden cutting flowers for the drawing-room vases, when her future lover's cab at Crispy George arrived. She colored up as beautifully as the roses in her hand when her former lover bowed low before her, and immediately proposed to go and seek her mother; as no one gainsayed her, away she flew. Mrs. Prosby was busy in her work-room when her daughter ran in, laughing, but confused, with mischievous eyes and a rosy face.

"Mamma, guess whom Willie has brought home! I was never so startled in my life," she cried, out of breath; "I never saw any body so ugly and awkward in a couple of years before!"

Mamma looked over her spectacles and looked out of the window, where she saw her son and his companion walking.

"Is it Francis George Percival Monke, Katie?" she asked, puzzled.

"Yes, mamma, and so altered. Don't you remember how foolish he was, and how we used to laugh at him?"

"Hush, my dear, the window is open, and he may hear you. I must go down and receive him; but Willie must have let us know. I wonder the room must be got ready for him, I suppose?" and Mrs. Prosby laid aside spectacles and thimble, and went down stairs to welcome her son's friend.

When Katie followed her, about ten minutes after, it was to find Francis George looking as much as she was capable of assuming on short notice; but she could not prevent a bright and rosy mischief consciousness flickering in eye and cheek as she faced Francis George. He blushed, too, and commented a little when he began to speak, especially in his old way; which put her at her ease more than any thing else could have done. He was very attentive, and appear to his lost advantage before her, and to impress her with a worthier opinion of his character than she had ever had. He began to epitomize a very solid lecture that he had heard a few evenings before. He ought to have understood that that curled about her pretty mouth better than he did. Sharp-witted Katie understood him well enough, and kind-hearted Katie did not fail to encourage him to shine to the utmost; but she thought his subject rather of the gravest for almost the first few minutes after they met.

"You are becoming quite a scientific character, Francis George," said Papa Prosby, at dessert after dinner, when the young gentleman had made what he thought a very impressive display of his new learning. "It is really creditable to you to have acquired so much solid information."

Francis George felt so pleased, and glanced at Katie to see if he had elicited her approbation also. Katie smiled to conceal her temptation to laugh, and he was thrown back on himself. He went home on every subject of interest in which he was sufficiently well up to converse, from the latest improvement of travels and biography, of poetry and romance, took their turn, until, if there was a doubt about what he knew, it was a doubt whether he did know too much. Katie would have been glad to hear him converse on everyday matters, but Francis George, with an old reputation to destroy and a new one to create, was not to be beguiled into trivialities. When he left Willingham early on Monday morning with Willie Prosby, he left it in the pleasing consciousness that he had inspired every body with respect for his learning.

"A well-informed young man," Mrs. Prosby gravely affirmed of him to be.

"Not so dull as he was, either," said Katie.

"Out of evil good has come," observed the clergyman. "His banishment from Hardington turns out a most providential."

"But it is a great shame, papa!" cried Misters Katie, firing up and looking very pretty; "it a great shame that his mother should have quarreled with him because he would not marry Flora Monke: it would have been strange if he had liked her, I think, such a sarcastic girl as she was, and such a flirt!"

Papa Prosby lifted his eyebrows, a little amazed at his daughter's decision of speech; and Katie, conscious that she had spoken rather harshly, blushed and looked down.

Francis George became a constant visitor at Willingham after this, and strove laboriously to win favorable opinion from all the family. If his beauty talk bored them a little sometimes, they bravely bore it; and, knowingly, Katie could have offered evidence that he was capable of more interesting discourse when he had her ear alone. In the garden, in the dining-room, in the quiet parlor-walk, does any body think that while Francis George was talking with a certain young lady sometimes to Katie's ears, that he was holding forth on interesting geological speculations? Would any body credit that Katie contemplated her shoe too so steadily, when they paused under the old yew, that she was meditating on the revelations of heavenly bodies? Or does any body imagine for a moment that when they sat so long on the little summer-house, they were both in a trance upon the circle, discussing the secret of perpetual motion? If any body does, any body is very much mistaken.

I think, mamma, I should be very happy with him," said Mistress Katie one day at her mother's knee. Then they were in the room of Mrs. Prosby's study, and much talk, even more serious than sentimental, and the daughter was making her confession. "I think, mamma, I should be very happy with him. I am sure he's very fond of me. He is a good, faithful fellow, mamma, who would never have sought me out again, when he knew how I used to make fun of him behind his back."

Mamma dare not undertake to say. "Katie must judge for herself," she added; "Katie was most capable of judging."

But you think him good, mamma. You think his principles sound and temper not bad?"

"Yes, love, papa and I are quite satisfied on that head."

Then, mamma, dear, why are you so cold and doubtful about us?"

"Because, Hardington is in the way—his mother is in the way. Remember our difference of position."

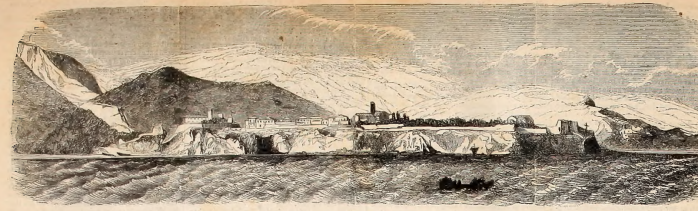
"I wish he were never to be any thing more than a lawyer's clerk," sighed Katie, getting off her knees and gliding to the window. Francis George was impatiently pacing the lawn, waiting for her re-appearance, and in a minute or two Mrs. Prosby was alone.

CHAPTER VII.

FRANCIS GEORGE PERCIVAL MONKE wrote to his mother, announcing his engagement to Katie Prosby, and his intention of marrying her soon. No answer was returned. He wrote to her again. Mr. Prosby wrote. Mrs. Prosby wrote. Katie wrote. No answer. Francis George then addressed his father, and the new service old gentleman wrote to him that he was free to please himself. His mother was perfectly indifferent to all his proceedings. If he wanted to know whether she would do any thing for him, he must answer to that—No.

So Francis George Percival Monke, heir of Hardington, lord of the manor of Hardington, married Katie Prosby, and took her home to a little six-roomed suburban villa, and went on toiling as a lawyer's clerk. Went on toiling through the best years of his life. Went on toiling until four children had been sent to him in the little six-roomed house. Went on toiling until the present life in its affectionate simplicity had quite obliterated the hard lines of the former life. Francis George's life; went on "toiling, rejoicing, sorrowing," until he had reached the middle period of the middle-class, quiet future which must come to him in the common course of nature.

There is plenty of space for happiness in a six-roomed suburban villa, with a garden of ten feet square—at least to the life of Francis George Percival Monke and Katie, his wife, testified. They had one care, and that was to give to their sons and daughters such an education as should put them forward in the world easily: this care was their only one. And this was their sorrow—Katie's first-born died, and was laid to rest in Willingham church-yard.



But however their cares, whatever their sorrows, whatever their joys, they were all mutual, and served but to draw closer together the links of affection and friendship that united the husband and wife. Neither ever regretted for a moment any sacrifice that had to be made for the other's sake.

CHAPTER VIII.

It is more than twenty years since the heir of Hardington and lord of the manor died. He has come to his kingdom at last, ripe in age, ripe in experience, and indifferent except to the best uses of that wealth, which, in the estimation of little its superfluities can influence our actual happiness in life.

His mother said, before she died, that she forgave him (forgave him what?), and sent for him to receive her blessing. Francis George, as usual always his awe and respect for her, fancies himself the last letter for it—perhaps he is the letter for him—I would not like to think that any kin of mine could carry an enmity against me into the other world. Whatever our wrongs, whatever our grievances, surely we can afford to lay them down with every other burden of life when we come to the grave-side!

There is a different rule in Hardington now from that which prevailed there once. Nowhere has the benefits of these times made itself more felt than there.

MONACO, AS SEEN FROM THE SEA.

THE PRINCIPALITY OF MONACO.

THE latest newspapers from Europe inform us that the Emperor of Russia is in treaty for the purchase of the little principality of Monaco, on the Gulf of Genoa. This design of his seems to have aroused the most violent opposition on the part of his brother sovereigns; and, in view of the excitement which is expected, we present the reader, this week, with two views of the town and territory of Monaco, and a picture of the Grand Staircase to the Palace—the principal attraction of the place to strangers.

Monaco is an independent principality about as big as a fair-sized American county, with a population of six to seven thousand, and a capital city of twelve hundred people. It overhangs the blue Mediterranean, whose expanse for many miles may be scanned from the windows of the handsome Louis Quatorze Palace. Adown the sides of the hills and in the valleys grow oranges, lemons, olives, and grapes; grain-fields dot the landscape here and there; the shrubbery is very lovely; the air even balmier than that of Nice; the people generally quiet, polite, and virtuous. A little Paradise on earth, in short. Happy in every respect save in its Government.

The Government of Monaco is despotic and patriarchal. The Prince does not, however, bowstring or behead his subjects from mere pastime. His tyranny is simply financial. He asks of his people a sum of $10,000 a year—that is to say, $1 75 for every man, woman, and child in the principality—and with this the honest man is satisfied. He goes to live at Paris on his income, and visits Monaco only in the season when a man of his fashion can not afford to be seen in town.

He has but his troubles though. Many years ago he quarreled with his brother sovereign, nearest neighbor, and old ally, the King of Sardinia. Like many another potentate, His Excellency of Monaco presumed on his feebleness, and most grievously insulted His Majesty of Sardinia. The latter, exasperated beyond endurance, declared war, and sent an army consisting of fourteen men, under an old and experienced sergeant, to invade the territory of Monaco and occupy a post which the rival potentates each claimed. The invasion was successful; Monaco, driven to sue for peace, agreed to the terms proposed by Sardinia, and the sovereigns were friends again. Ever since this little affair Sardinia, fearful lest some other power should follow the example she set, and seize Monaco, has graciously, at her own expense, garrisoned the castle of the Prince with 300 Sardinian troops.

STAIR-CASE OF THE PALACE OF MONACO.

A few years ago the Prince of Monaco was very hard up, having just returned from a most unlucky season at Baden. It occurred to him, while reflecting on his distresses, that the Grand Duke of Baden made a great deal of money by licensing gambling-houses in his dominions; and that he, the Prince, would retrieve his shattered fortunes in a remarkably short space of time if he did the like. Accordingly, experienced gamblers were hired by the Prince; and, next summer, roulette and rouge et noire tables were opened at Monaco. The fashionable world were notified that they could lose their money and blow their brains out as satisfactorily by the side of the blue Mediterranean as under the dusky sky of Germany. But they wouldn't take the hint. Baden had the prestige. Baden was near Paris, near London; near every where.—So, after waiting all summer, with his croupiers feeding on him, the poor Prince of Monaco was obliged to return to Paris poorer than ever.

His last device is the scheme to which we allude above. He wants to sell his principality to Russia. It would be a good thing for him; a good thing for Russia, which needs a Mediterranean port badly; but it is not likely to suit Sardinia and France quite as well.

If Russia owned Monaco she would keep a powerful squadron in the Mediterranean, and, by choosing her time properly, might renew her designs on Turkey with almost a certainty of success. A breakwater would convert the anchorage at Monaco into a large and safe harbor.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER IV.

Guy Darrell's views in the invitation to Waife. LIONEL had but inadequately represented, for he could but imperfectly comprehend, the profound impression made upon Guy Darrell by George Morley's disclosures. Himself so capable of self-sacrifice, Darrell was the man above all others to regard with an admiring reverence, which partook of awe, a self-immolation that seemed almost above humanity—to him who set so lofty an estimate on good name and fair repute. He had not only willingly permitted, but even urged Lionel to repair to Waife, and persuade the old man to come to Fawley. With Waife he was prepared to enter into the full discussion of Sophy's alleged parentage. But apart even from considerations that touched a cause of perplexity which disquieted himself, Darrell was eager to see and to show homage to the sufferer, in whom he recognized a hero's dignity. And if he had sent by Lionel no letter from himself to Waife, it was only because, in the exquisite delicacy of feeling that belonged to him when his best emotions were aroused he felt it just that the whole merit, and the whole delight of reparation to the wrongs of William Losely, should, without direct interposition of his own, be left exclusively to Charles Haughton's son. Thus far it will be acknowledged that Guy Darrell was not one of those men who, once warmed to magnanimous impulse, are cooled by a thrifty prudence when action grows out of the impulse. Guy Darrell could not be generous by drachm and scruple. Not apt to say, "I apologize"—slow to say, "I repent;" very—very—very slow indeed to say, "I forgive;" yet let him once say, "I repent," "I apologize," or "I forgive," and it was said with his whole heart and soul.

But it must not be supposed that, in authorizing Lionel to undertake the embassy to Waife, or in the anticipation of what might pass between Waife and himself should the former consent to revisit the old house from which he had been so scornfully driven, Darrell had altered, or dreamed of altering, one iota of his resolves against a union between Lionel and Sophy. True, Lionel had induced him to say, "Could it be indisputably proved that no drop of Jasper Losely's blood were in this girl's veins—that she were the lawful child of honest parents, however humble—my right to stand between her and yourself would cease." But a lawyer's experience is less credulous than a lover's hope. And to Darrell's judgment it was wholly improbable that any honest parents, however humble, should have yielded their child to a knave like Jasper, while it was so probable that his own persuasion was well-founded, and that she was Jasper's daughter, though not Matilda's.

The winter-evening had closed. George and Darrell were conversing in the library; the theme, of course, was Waife; and Darrell listened with vivid interest to George's graphic accounts of the old man's gentle, playful humor—with its vague desultory under-currents of poetic fancy or subtle wisdom. But when George turned to speak of Sophy's endearing, lovely nature, and, though cautiously, to intimate an appeal on her behalf to Darrell's sense of duty, or susceptibility to kindly emotions, the proud man's brow became knit, and his stately air evinced displeasure. Fortunately, just at a moment when farther words might have led to a permanent coldness between men so disposed to esteem each other, they heard the sound of wheels on the frosty ground—the shrill bell at the porch-door.

CHAPTER V.

The vagabond received in the Manor House at Fawley.

Very lamely, very feebly, declining Lionel's arm, but leaning heavily on his crutch-stick, Waife crossed the threshold of the Manor House. George sprang forward to welcome him. The old man looked on the preacher's face with a kind of wandering uncertainty in his eye, and George saw that his cheek was very much flushed. He limped on through the hall, still leaning on his staff, George and Lionel at either side. A pace or two, and there stood Darrell! Did he, the host, not spring forward to offer an arm, to extend a hand! No, such greeting in Darrell would have been but vulgar courtesy. As the old man's eye rested on him, the superb gentleman bowed low—bowed as we bow to kings!

They entered the library. Darrell made a sign to George and Lionel. They understood the sign, and left visitor and host alone.

Lionel drew George into the quaint old dining-hall. "I am very uneasy about our dear friend," he said, in agitated accents. "I fear that I have had too little consideration for his years and his sensitive nature, and that, what with the excitement of the conversation that passed between us, and the fatigue of the journey, his nerves have broken down. We were not half-way on the road, and as we had the railway carriage to ourselves, I was talking to him with imprudent earnestness, when he began to tremble all over, and went into a hysterical paroxysm of mingled tears and laughter. I wished to stop at the next station, but he was not long recovering, and insisted on coming on. Still, as we approached Fawley, after muttering to himself, as far as I could catch his words, incoherently, he sank into a heavy state of lethargy or stupor, resting his head on my shoulder. It was with difficulty I roused him when he entered the park."

"Poor old man," said George, feelingly; "no doubt the quick succession of emotions through which he has lately passed has overcome him for the time. But the worst is now past. His interview with Darrell must cheer his heart and soothe his spirits; and that interview over, we must give him all repose and nursing. But tell me what passed between you—if he was very indignant that I could not suffer men like you and my uncle Alban, and Guy Darrell, to believe him a pick-lock and a thief?"

Lionel began his narrative, but had not proceeded far in it before Darrell's voice was heard shouting loud and the library bell rang violently.

They hurried into the library, and Lionel's fears were verified. Waife was in strong convulsions; and as these gradually ceased, and he rested without struggle, half on the floor, half in Darrell's arms, he was evidently unconscious of all around him. His eye was open, but fixed in a glassy stare. The servants thronged into the room; one was dispatched instantly to summon the nearest medical practitioner. "Help me—George—Lionel," said Darrell, "to bear him up stairs. Mills, light us." When they reached the landing-place, Mills asked, "Which room, Sir?"

Darrell hesitated an instant, then his gray eye lit into its dark fire. "My father's room—he shall rest on my father's bed."

When the surgeon arrived, he declared Waife to be in imminent danger—pressure on the brain. He prescribed prompt and vigorous remedies, which had indeed before the surgeon's arrival suggested themselves to, and been partly commenced by, Darrell, who had gone through too many varieties of experience to be unversed in the rudiments of leechcraft. "If I were in my guest's state," asked Darrell of the practitioner, "what would you do?"

"Telegraph instantly for Dr. F——."

"Lionel—you hear? Take my own horse—he will carry you like the wind. Off to * * * *; it is the nearest telegraph station."

Darrell did not stir from Waife's bedside all that anxious night. Dr. F—— did not arrive till morning. He approved of all that had been done, but nevertheless altered the treatment; and after staying some hours, said to Darrell, "I am compelled to leave you for the present; nor could I be of use in staying. I have given all the aid in my power to Nature—we must leave the rest to Nature herself. That fever—those fierce throes and spasms—are but Nature's efforts to cast off the grasp of the enemy we do not see. It now depends on what degree of rallying power be left to the patient. Fortunately, his frame is robust, yet not plethoric. Do you know his habits?"

"I know," answered George; "most temperate, most innocent."

"Then, with constant care, minute attention to my directions, he may recover."

"If care and attention can save my guest's life he shall not die," said Darrell.

The physician looked at the speaker's pale face and compressed lips. "But, Mr. Darrell, I must not have you on my hands too. You must not be out of your bed again to-night."

"Certainly not," said George. "I shall watch alone."

"No," cried Lionel, "that is my post, too."

"Pooh!" said Darrell; "young men so far from Death are not such watchful sentinels against his stroke as men of my years, who have seen him in all aspects; and, moreover, base indeed is the host who deserts his own guest's sick-chamber. Fear not for me, doctor; no man needs sleep less than I do."

Dr. F—— slid his hand on Darrell's pulse. "Irregular—quick; but what vitality! what power!—a young man's pulse! Mr. Darrell, many years for your country's service are yet in these lusty beats."

Darrell breathed his chronic sigh, and, turning back to Waife's bedside, said, "When will you come again?"

"The day after to-morrow."

When the doctor returned Waife was out of immediate danger. Nature, fortified by the "temperate, innocent habits" which husband up her powers, had dislodged, at least for a time, her enemy; but the attack was followed by extreme debility. It was clear that for days, perhaps even weeks to come, the vagrant must remain a prisoner under Darrell's roof-tree.

Lionel had been too mindful of Sophy's anxiety to neglect writing to Lady Montfort the day after Waife's seizure. But he could not find the heart to state the old man's danger; and with the sanguine tendencies of his young nature, even when at the worst, he clung to belief in the best. He refrained from any separate and private communication of Waife's state to Lady Montfort, lest the sadness it would not fail to occasion her should be perceptible to Sophy, and lead her to divine the cause. So he contented himself with saying that Waife had accompanied him to Mr. Darrell's, and would be detained there, treated with all kindness and honor, for some days.

Sophy's mind was relieved by this intelligence, but it filled her with wonder and conjecture. That Waife, who had so pertinaciously refused to break bread as a guest under any man's roof-tree, should be for days receiving the hospitality of Lionel Haughton's wealthy and powerful kinsman, was indeed mysterious. But whatever brought Waife and Lionel thus in confidential intercourse could not but renew yet more vividly the hopes she had been endeavoring of late to stifle. And combining together many desultory remembrances of words escaped unawares from Lionel, from Lady Montfort, from Waife himself, the truth (of which her native acuteness had before admitted glimpses) grew almost clear to her. Was not Mr. Darrell that relation to her lost mother upon whom she had claims not hitherto conceded? Lionel and Waife both with that relation now! Surely the clouds that had rested on her future were admitting the sun through their opening rents—and she blushed as she caught its ray.

CHAPTER VI.

Individual concessions are like political; when you once begin, there is no saying where you will stop.

Waife's first words on recovering consciousness were given to thoughts of Sophy. He had promised her to return, at farthest, the next day; she would be so uneasy—he must get up—he must go at once. When he found his strength would not suffer him to rise, he shed tears. It was only very gradually, and at intervals, that he became acquainted with the length and severity of his attack, or fully sensible that he was in Darrell's house; that that form, of which he had retained vague, dreamy reminiscences, hanging over his pillow, wiping his brow, and soothing him with the sweetest tones of the sweet human voice—that that form, so genial, so brotherlike, was the man who had once commanded him not to sully with his presence a stainless home.

All that had passed within the last few days was finally made clear to him in a short, unwitnessed, touching conversation with his host; after which, however, he became gradually worse; his mind remaining clear, but extremely dejected; his bodily strength evidently sinking. Dr. F—— was again summoned in haste. That great physician was, as every great physician should be, a profound philosopher, though with a familiar ease of manner, and a light, off-hand vein of talk, which made the philosophy less sensible to the taste than any other ingredient in his pharmacopœia. Turning every body else out of the room, he examined his patient alone—sounded the old man's vital organs, with ear and with stethoscope—talked to him now on his feelings, now on the news of the day, and then stepped out to Darrell.

"Something on the heart, my dear Sir; I can't get at it; perhaps you can. Take off that something, and the springs will react, and my patient will soon recover. All about him sound as a rock—but the heart; that has been horribly worried; something worries it now. His heart may be seen in his eye. Watch his eye; it is missing some face it is accustomed to see."

Darrell changed color. He stole back into Waife's room, and took the old man's hand. Waife returned the pressure, and said, "I was just praying for you—and—and—I am sinking fast. Do not let me die, Sir, without wishing poor Sophy a last good-by!"

Darrell passed back to the landing-place, where George and Lionel were standing, while Dr. F—— was snatching a hasty refreshment in the library before his return to town. Darrell laid his hand on Lionel's shoulder. "Lionel, you must go back to London with Dr. F——. I can not keep you here longer. I want your room."

"Sir," said Lionel, aghast, "while Waife is still so ill! You can not be thus unkind."

"Inconsiderate egotist! would you deprive the old man of a presence dearer to him than yours? George, you will go too; but you will return. You told me yesterday that your wife was in London for a few days; entreat her to accompany you hither; entreat her to bring with her the poor young lady whom my guest pines to see at his bedside—the face that his eye misses."

CHAPTER VII.

Sophy, Darrell, and the Flute-player. Darrell prepares a surprise for Waife.

Sophy is come. She has crossed that inexorable threshold. She is a guest in the house which rejects her as a daughter. She has been there some days. Waife revived at the first sight of her tender face. He has left his bed; can move for some hours a day into an adjoining chamber, which has been hastily arranged for his private sitting-room; and can walk its floors with a step that grows daily firmer in the delight of leaning on Sophy's arm.

Since the girl's arrival, Darrell has relaxed his watch over the patient. He never now enters his guest's apartment without previous notice; and, by that incommunicable instinct which passes in households between one silent breast and another, as by a law equally strong to attract or repel—here drawing together, there keeping apart—though no rule in either case has been laid down—by virtue, I say, of that strange intelligence, Sophy is not in the old man's room when Darrell enters. Rarely in the twenty-four hours do the host and the fair young guest encounter. But Darrell is a quick and keen observer. He has seen enough of Sophy to be sensible of her charm—to penetrate into her simple, natural loveliness of character—to feel a deep interest in her, and a still deeper pity for Lionel. Secluding himself as much as possible in his private room, or in his leafless woods, his reveries increase in gloom. Nothing unbends his moody brow like Fairthorn's flute or Fairthorn's familiar converse.

It has been said before that Fairthorn knew his secrets. Fairthorn had idolized Caroline Lyndsay. Fairthorn was the only being in the world to whom Guy Darrell could speak of Caroline Lyndsay—to whom he could own the unconquerable but unforgiving love which had twice driven him from the social world. Even to Fairthorn, of course, all could not be told. Darrell could not speak of the letter he had received at Malta, nor of Caroline's visit to him at Fawley; for to do so, even to Fairthorn, was like a treason to the dignity of the Beloved. And Guy Darrell might rail at her inconstancy—her heartlessness; but to boast that she had lowered herself by the proffers that were dictated by repentance, Guy Darrell could not do that;—he was a gentleman. Still there was much left to say. He could own that he thought she would now accept his hand; and when Fairthorn looked happy at that thought, and hinted at excuses for her former fickleness, it was a great relief to Darrell to fly into a rage; but if the flute-player meanly turned round and became himself Caroline's accuser, then poor Fairthorn was indeed frightened, for Darrell's trembling lip or melancholy manner overwhelmed the assailant with self-reproach, and sent him sidelong into one of his hidden coverts.

But at this moment Fairthorn was a support to him under other trials—Fairthorn, who respects as he does, as no one else ever can, the sanctity of the Darrell line—who would shrink like himself from the thought that the daughter of Jasper Losely, and in all probability not a daughter of Matilda Darrell, should ever be mistress of that ancestral hall, lowly and obscure and mouldering though it be—and that the child of a sharper, a thief, a midnight assassin, should carry on the lineage of knights and warriors in whose stainless scutcheons, on many a Gothic tomb or over the portals of ruined castles, was impaled the heraldry of Brides sprung from the loins of Lion Kings! Darrell, then, doing full justice to all Sophy's beauty and grace, purity and goodness, was more and more tortured by the conviction that she could never be wife to the man on whom, for want of all nearer kindred, would devolve the heritage of the Darrell name.

On the other hand, Sophy's feelings toward her host were almost equally painful and imbittered. The tenderness and reverence that he had showed to her beloved grandfather, the affecting gratitude with which Waife spoke of him, necessarily deepened her prepossessions in his favor as Lionel's kinsman; and though she saw him so sparingly, still, when they did meet, she had no right to complain of his manner. It might be distant, taciturn; but it was gentle, courteous—the manner which might be expected, in a host of secluded habits, to a young guest from whose sympathies he was removed by years, but to whose comforts he was unobtrusively considerate—whose wishes were delicately forestalled. Yet was this all that her imagination had dared to picture on entering those gray walls? Where was the evidence of the relationship of which she had dreamed?—where a single sign that she was more in that house than a mere guest?—where, alas! a token that even Lionel had named her to his kinsman, and that for Lionel's sake that kinsman bade her welcome? And Lionel too—gone the very day before she arrived! That she learned incidentally from the servant who showed her into her room. Gone, and not addressed a line to herself, though but to condole with her on her grandfather's illness, or congratulate her that the illness had spared the life! She felt wounded to the very core. As Waife's progressive restoration allowed her thoughts more to revert to so many causes for pain and perplexity, the mystery of all connected with her own and Waife's sojourn under that roof baffled her attempts at conjecture. The old man did not volunteer explanations. Timidly she questioned him; but his nerves yet were so unstrung, and her questions so evidently harassed him, that she only once made that attempt to satisfy her own bewilderment, and smiled as if contented when he said, after a long pause, "Patience yet, my child; let me get a little stronger. You see Mr. Darrell will not suffer me to talk with him on matters that must be discussed with him before I go; and then—and then—Patience till then, Sophy."

Neither George nor his wife gave her any clew to the inquiries that preyed upon her mind. The latter, a kind, excellent woman, meekly devoted to her husband, either was, or affected to be, in ignorance of the causes that had led Waife to Fawley, save very generally that Darrell had once wronged him by an erring judgment, and had hastened to efface that wrong. And then she kissed Sophy fondly, and told her that brighter days were in store for the old man and herself. George said, with more authority—the authority of the priest—"Ask no questions. Time, that solves all riddles, is hurrying on, and Heaven directs its movements."

Her very heart was shut up, except where it could gush forth—nor even then with full tide—in letters to Lady Montfort. Caroline had heard from George's wife, with intense emotion, that Sophy was summoned to Darrell's house, the gravity of Waife's illness being considerately suppressed. Lady Montfort could but suppose that Darrell's convictions had been shaken—his resolutions softened; that he sought an excuse to see Sophy, and judge of her himself. Under this impression, in parting with her young charge, Caroline besought Sophy to write to her constantly, and frankly. Sophy felt an inexpressible relief in this correspondence. But Lady Montfort in her replies was not more communicative than Waife or the Morleys, only she seemed more thoughtfully anxious that Sophy should devote herself to the task of propitiating her host's affections. She urged her to try and break through his reserve—see more of him; as if that were possible! And her letters were more filled with questions about Darrell than even with admonitions and soothings to Sophy. The letters that arrived at Fawley were brought in a bag, which Darrell opened; but Sophy noticed that it was with a peculiar compression of lip, and a marked change of color, that he had noticed the handwriting on Lady Montfort's first letter to her, and that after that first time her letters were not inclosed in the bag, but came apart, and were never again given to her by her host.

Thus passed days in which Sophy's time was spent chiefly in Waife's sick-room. But now he is regaining strength hourly. To his sitting-room comes George frequently to relieve Sophy's watch. There, once a day, comes Guy Darrell, and what then passed between the two men none witnessed. In these hours Waife insisted upon Sophy's going forth for air and exercise. She is glad to steal out alone—steal down by the banks of the calm lake, or into the gloom of the mournful woods. Here she not unfrequently encounters Fairthorn, who, having taken more than ever to the flute, is driven more than ever to outdoor rambles; for he has been cautioned not to indulge in his melodious reminiscences within doors before the children slept.

Fairthorn and Sophy thus made acquaintance, distant and shy at first on both sides; but it gradually became more frank and cordial. Fairthorn had an object not altogether friendly in encouraging this intimacy. He thought, poor man, that he should be enabled to extract from Sophy some revelations of her early life, which would elucidate, not in favor of her asserted claims, the mystery that hung upon her parentage. But had Dick Fairthorn been the subtlest of diplomatists, in this hope he would have been equally disappointed. Sophy had nothing to communicate. Her ingenuousness utterly baffled the poor fate-player. Out of an innocent, unconscious kind of spite, on reading to joy into Sophy's descent, he began to enlarge upon the dignity of Derrell, as the last scion of the long-winded genealogical memoir, the recital of which had, on a previous occasion, so nearly driven Mr. Slaughter from Fairthorn. He took her to see the antiquary's grave; its spoke to her, as they stood there, of Derrell's ambitious boyhood—his arid, laborious manhood—his determination to restore the fallen line—the very vow he had made to his dead wife he had so grievously revered. He sought to impress on her the consideration of what was the ingenest of one who belonged to a race with whom spotless honor was the all in all; and who had gone through life with utter security from the reasoning that race, and vindicating that honor. Fairthorn's cunning and tremble-while eye rested on her while he talked. She, poor child, could not divine why; but she felt that he was angry with his own speech of all. In vain, Fairthorn's prickly tongue was on the barbed point of exclaiming, "And how do you feel yourself born into this unsullied lineage?—how dare you think that the dead would not turn in their graves on their own walks round and round the walls of the Derrells for the daughter of a Jasper Landyl?" But the wonderful self-command which the musician's covert meaning in these heraldic discourses, Sophy, with a justness of discrimination that must have been intuitive, gathered from the more fantastic declamations of the grotesque genealogist of their subtle sense of pride and pathetic in the single image of the last descendant in a long and gradually-falling race, lifting it as a crown into power and note on the toiling shoulders, and standing on the verge of age, with the feeble consciousness that all this effort was successful only for his fleeting life; that, with all his gold, with all his fame, the hope of the name must sake for ever with him, the fame was a lying mockery, and that name and race would perish with himself, unless the earth yawned for him beside the antiquary's grave. And these restless maids her conceive a more soft and tender interest in Guy Derrell—one he had before admitted; they accounted for the mournfulness of his voice; they imputed to his voluntary ave of that statelines of bearing, which before had only chilled her as the effluence of pride.

While Fairthorn and Sophy thus matured acquaintance, Derrell and Waife were drawing closer and closer to each other. Certainly no two would be psychologists could suspect any genuine of taste, intellect, experience, or emotion, between two men whose lives had been so widely different—one whose faculties or mode of ordinary observer would have seen nothing but antagonism and contrast. Nevertheless, in these characters were strikingly dissimilar, yet there was that in each which the other recognized as familiar to his own nature. Each had been the victim of his heart; each had passed over the phenomena of self-sacrifice. Derrell had given up his youth—Waife his age;—Derrell to a Fetiche and the unexpiring Dead—Waife to a Son, whose life had become his term. The same, Nemo had been an idol; to the other, Nemo had been a weed cast away into the highway. To one man, unjurious, evanescent glory—to the other, a shame that had been borne with a sportive cheerfulness, dashed into perverse mirth by the world's customarily threatened to despoil Affection of its food. But there was a common chain in their joint experience of earthly vanities;—so little scope in worldly honors to the triumphant Master—so little of value in the vagrant Mime while his conscience meekly appealed to Heaven for the purity of his aims. And as beneath all the levity and whim of the man reared and nurtured, and fitted by his characteristic tendencies, to view life through its humors, not through its passions, there still ran a deep under-current of grave and earnest meditation—so beneath so, too, amidst the severe and stateliier texture of the once ambitious, laborious mind, which had conquered literary renown—amidst all that gathered-up intensity of passion, which admitted no relaxation of sorrow, and saw in Love but the aspect of Fate—amidst all this lofty seriousness of soul, there was yet a vivid current of appreciation of the fine sensibilities to the pleasurable sun-rays of life, which are sometimes found in a child, no matter how grave its vocations. True, affection at last may dull them, as it dulls all else that we took from Nature else our perception of all in life. Yet, in the wind of Derrell, affection had shattered the things most dear to man, and no more than it had marred its perceptive acknowledgment of the sympathies between fancies that move to smiles, and thoughts that beget grave solemn lessons, or melt to sad tears. Had Derrell been placed amidst the circumstances so that make happy the homes of earnest men, Derrell would have been mirthful; and Waife been placed among the circumstances that concentrate talent, and bridge round life with cultured thickgate and thought, Waife, too, would have been grave.

It was not in the earlier conferences that took place in Waife's apartment that the subject which had led the old man to Fardo, and brought him discussion. When Waife had sought to introduce it—when, after Sophy's arrival, he had looked wistfully into Derrell's face, striving to read there the impression she had created, and, unable to discover, had begun, with tremulous accents, to regret the haste that weighed on him—Derrell stopped him at once. "Friend," said he, "I perceive that it was in the very moment you first broached this sorrowful topic, on arriving here, and perceived how different the point of view from which we two must regard it, that your nerves were over-excited, and your speech unwise. It is not only till you are stronger that we know each other better. This subject is one that it becomes us to treat with all the strength of our reason—with all the calm which either can impose upon the other. Spare it, therefore, now. At present, talk we of all matters except that, which I promise you shall be fairly discussed at last."

Derrell found, however, that his most effectual excuse from the subject was unnecessary. Sophy was through another channel in the old man's affections, hopes, and fears. George Morley, in repeating the conversation he had overheard between Waife and Jasper, had naturally, while excusing the act for which he professed the bravado and cynicism of the son's language, and more than ever lightened the load of natural feeling by which the bravado and cynicism had been alternated. And Derrell had sufficient magnanimity to appreciate the repentance with which he approached a name associated with so many dark and baleful memories, and, avoiding on much as possible direct reference to Jasper's past life, to court a confidence on the subject of which he could not trust the life that yet remained. With whom else, indeed, than Jasper's father could Derrell so properly and so unreservedly discuss a matter in which their interest and their fear were in common? Was he not, in the most delicate sense compensation to Waife for the disappointment he would experience when Sophy's claims to be of kindred, to be could have no fear in leaving the old man's mind as to the ultimate fate of his darling child. Was he not, in the noble sacrifice, Derrell spoke to Waife somewhat in the same views which he had formerly instructed Colonel Morley to find out and to treat with Jasper. He heard from the Colonel almost daily. Allen had not yet communicated with nor even succeeded in tracing Mrs. Crane! But an account of Jasper's wild farewell visit to that set of diamonds, from which he could infer a bad triumphant, had reached the ears of a detective employed by the Colonel, and the latter daily good terms with Catts; and it was no small comfort to know that Jasper had finally broken with those miscreant allies, and that he could again been seen in their haunts. As Arabella had not returned to her home, that was a good sign, and neither he nor Derrell was acquainted with what the one bore, nor with what reason on the subject could be put to Waife during the earlier stages of his illness, so it was several days before the Colonel's letter arrived, announcing her out as Mrs. Crane of Polden Place—a discovery effected by a distant relative whom he had been referred at the famous school of which Arabella had been the pride, and who had left the place before the girl's marriage, to count-books by which the poor grim woman had since vainly sought to trace the fugitive's movements. But the house in Polden Place was shut up—not a soul in charge of it. The houses immediately adjoining it were empty. But the Colonel learned, however, from a female, servant in an adjacent house, that several days after she had seen a tall, powerful-looking man enter Mrs. Crane's street-door; that she had not seen him go out; that some workmen employed by this servant was closing up the house in which the servant, in the absence of her master, had carriage driving away from Mrs. Crane's door; that it was too dark to see who was in the carriage, but that she had noticed a woman's veil fall; fishy sure was Mrs. Crane's servant, Bridget Jones, and that she was not to be found.

Allen had been to the agent employed by Mrs. Crane in the letting of her houses, but had learned from him nothing more than that Mrs. Crane believed that Mrs. Crane had succeeded in recovering property of which a child, perhaps, accompanied him abroad. If with her, at all events, for the present, he was safe from the law. Derrell, and half one day he was absent, he gave him from his own guilty self. If, however, still in England, Allen had no doubt, sooner or later, to hunt him up.

Upon the whole, this conjectural information, though unsatisfactory, and not at all conclusive, Derrell made the most of it in his representations to Waife. The old man was not aware that Arabella was one but hard to comfort, never quarreling irrascably with Hope.

And Waife is rapidly recovering. Derrell, after spending the greater part of several days with him, thought it of study Sophy's sake he had been estranged for many years, takes to frequent absences for the whole day; goes up to the metropolis; neither does George, but the latter seems unusually animated and excited. At length, after one of these excursions, so foreign to his habits, he and George enter together the old man's apartment not long before the early hour at which the convalescent retires to rest. Sophy was seated on the footstool at Waife's knee, reading the Bible to him, his hand resting on her head, as she read. Derrell's heart touched both. George and Derrell; but Derrell, of the two, was the more affected. What young, pure voice shall read to him the Book of Hope in the evening of lonely age? Sophy started at some confusion, and as, in quitting the room, she passed by Derrell, he took her hand gently, and scanned her features more deliberately, more earnestly than he had ever yet seemed to do; then he sighed, and dropped the hand, murmuring, "Fardon me." Was he seeking to read in that fair face some likeness to the Damsel Innocent? If he had found it, what then? But when Sophy was gone, Derrell came straight to Waife with a cheerful brow—with a kindling eye.

"William Lovely," said he.

"Wallk, if you please, Sa," interrupted the old man.

"William Lovely," repeated Derrell, "justice demands that we keep no secrets, as I have pretered, but whether you were clearly, incontestably innocent of the act, and, in pleading guilty, did but nobilmly bear the penalty of another. There will be no new trial—there are none who would prosecute. I bring back to you the Queen's free pardon under the Great Seal. I should explain to you that this form of the royalty grace is so rare, even that it needs all the strength and affecting circumstance of your personal case to justify the Government in granting, not only to the interest I could bring to bear in your favor, but to his own humane impulses. This pardon under the Great Seal differs from an ordinary pardon. It purges the deed from the taint of felony—it remits all the civil disabilities which the mere expiry of a penal sentence does not remove. In short, as applicable to your case, it becomes virtually a complete and formal attestation of your innocence. Allan Raby will take care to supress those of your old friends who may yet survive of that revocation of unjust obloquy which this pardon implies. Come—Allen Morley, we forgive his book on a prince of the blood if but many of some jockey trick on the turf in Newcastle openly, and in broad daylight, if you please; and trust to us three—the Solister, the Author, and the Gentleman—to give to the pardon that value which your Sovereign's advisers intend it to have."

"Your hand now, dear old friend?" cried George. "You remember I commanded you never to shake hands as man and gentleman—a man and gentleman now borne me with yours."

"Ah, Jorge!" faltered Waife, and he held out to George's, the other extended in imploring appeal to Derrell—"is it possible? I vindicated—I cleared—and yet no felon's dock for Jasper!—the son not criminated by the father's acquittal—Tell me that! again!"

"It is so, believe me. All that rests is to force on that son, if he have a human heart, the conviction that he will be worse than a parricide if he will not save himself."

"And he will—he shall!—Oh that I could but get at him!" exclaimed the preacher.

"And now," said Derrell—"now, George, leave us; for you, upon equal terms, we two fathers can discuss family differences."

may be read with interest by Public SPEAKERS, SINGERS, and others, requiring the same article.

From Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, who has used the Troches for years, and I have never changed my opinion regarding them from the first, except to think better of them. I have found them a most useful article, and I have recommended them so far as I am with opportunity of comparison, your Troches are pre-eminently the best, and the first in the great Lozenge School.

From Rev. E. H. Chapin, D.D., New York.—"I consider Brown's Bronchial Troches as a very valuable preparation, and recommend their use to Public Speakers."

From Mr. C. B. Gardiner, Principal of the Burgen Female Seminary, Jersey City.—"I have been afflicted with Bronchitis during the past winter, and found no relief until I tried your Troches."

FIFTH YEAR. NEW FEATURES! READ WHAT THE BEST WRITERS SAY. MORE BRILLIANT THAN EVER! COSMOPOLITAN ART JOURNAL. THE ART JOURNAL.—This superbly beautiful Magazine, which every subscriber to the COSMOPOLITAN ART ASSOCIATION gets GRATIS, in addition to the Engraving "VILLAGE BLACKSMITH," is one of the most elegant and valuable Magazines published. It contains over 70 large pages of literary articles, costly Steel Engravings, and numerous Illustrations. Among the innumerable notices from the Press confirming the above statement, the following will suffice:

"It fully maintains its high character as a record of art and literature. Its typography and illustrations are unexceptionable."—Harper's Magazine.

"The best and cheapest publication of the kind extant."—Courier.

"Deserves a large patronage."—Baptist Banner.

"Splendid affair."—Gilliam, Illinois, N. Y.

"We particularly call attention to its reading matter."—Godey.

"Its excellences have made it famous."—Standard, Gloversville, N. Y.

"Worth the whole subscription."—Baltimore Clipper.

"How so valuable a work can be afforded at so moderate a price is a mystery."—Patriot, Concord, N. H.

"In every respect a perfect gem."—Democrat, Greenfield, Mass.

"Magnificent quarterly."—Witness, Middletown, Conn.

"One of the most reflective."—Journal of Commerce, N. O. Delta.

"Artistic taste and surpassing merit."—Argus, Towanda, Pa.

"Popular throughout the world."—News, Darien, Wis.

"Merits of the first order."—Herald, Chester, Ill.

"Of itself worth three dollars."—Democrat, Prattsville, Ala.

"Very high order of merit."—Dollikan (Miss.) Gazette.

"Maintains a high character."—Troy Budget.

"All lovers of art should have it."—Iowa City, Courier.

"No magazine surpasses it."—Iowa City Republican.

Such expressions prove what is claimed for it. The Association submits its claims to the public, confident that they will command a wide patronage. Over all subscriptions to the Association received previous to the evening of January 1, 1859, will be in time.

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH.

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH.—This truly elegant Steel Engraving, which is sent to every subscriber of the COSMOPOLITAN ART ASSOCIATION (for $5, together with ART JOURNAL, &c.), is a large Parlor picture, after Hiffernan's great Painting, and printed on heavy plate paper, 20x26 inches, and sent on mail rollers, prepaid, to any part of the country. Its subject combines many beauties, as will be inferred from the following by the able author of the Sun Vox Evening Express:

"THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH represents the interior of a smithy, and the smith in the act of shoeing a large white horse, with the right hind foot between his knees. Just as his pincers are fairly hold of the shoe, his attention is diverted by a musical interlude, and while on half seeing, he seems to feel the smiling pressure of his wife, who stands close at his side, with the dinner-basket on her arm. A full-bodied hound in the foreground is interested in the operation, and the horse, in another foreground figure in the picture—a group of four—a horse, one of which, a boy, is having one set accustomed; a man, who is evidently such a man, reminding one of Longfellow's lines—

"The smith, a mighty man was he,' &c.,

—a woman who comes in with her "good cheer," She's a blessing, reminding one of Wordsworth's

"Creature not too bright and good
For human nature's daily food,"

—and a noble hound, marvelously foreshortened, completing the Walter Scott, with his haunches and horns. It is a masterpiece, and we can not contemplate it long without feeling in love, at least, with the smith and the horse, the unsophisticated grace of the angel and the unsophisticated strength of the beast. Long may it have' old friends, and for such a scene wife, we would give our heart and hild."

"One Great Cosmopolitan Art Journal from every section of the country, come the following opinions of the engraving:

"Electing universal admiration." (Rest. Transcript.

"It is above fine delicacy." (Evening paper.

"A splendid picture." (Boston Post.

"Equal to any specimen of art ever produced in this country." (Baltimore American.

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH.

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH.—This truly elegant Steel Engraving, which is sent to every subscriber of the COSMOPOLITAN ART ASSOCIATION (for $5, together with ART JOURNAL, &c.), is a large Parlor picture, after Hiffernan's great Painting, and printed on heavy plate paper, 20x26 inches, and sent on mail rollers, prepaid, to any part of the country. Its subject combines many beauties, as will be inferred from the following by the able author of the Sun Vox Evening Express:

"THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH represents the interior of a smithy, and the smith in the act of shoeing a large white horse, with the right hind foot between his knees. Just as his pincers are fairly hold of the shoe, his attention is diverted by a musical interlude, and while on half seeing, he seems to feel the smiling pressure of his wife, who stands close at his side, with the dinner-basket on her arm. A full-bodied hound in the foreground is interested in the operation, and the horse, in another foreground figure in the picture—a group of four—a horse, one of which, a boy, is having one set accustomed; a man, who is evidently such a man, reminding one of Longfellow's lines—

"The smith, a mighty man was he,' &c.,

—a woman who comes in with her "good cheer," She's a blessing, reminding one of Wordsworth's

"Creature not too bright and good
For human nature's daily food,"

—and a noble hound, marvelously foreshortened, completing the Walter Scott, with his haunches and horns. It is a masterpiece, and we can not contemplate it long without feeling in love, at least, with the smith and the horse, the unsophisticated grace of the angel and the unsophisticated strength of the beast. Long may it have' old friends, and for such a scene wife, we would give our heart and hild."

"One Great Cosmopolitan Art Journal from every section of the country, come the following opinions of the engraving:

"Electing universal admiration." (Rest. Transcript.

"It is above fine delicacy." (Evening paper.

"A splendid picture." (Boston Post.

"Equal to any specimen of art ever produced in this country." (Baltimore American.

THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER!

PROSPECTUS FOR THE YEAR 1859.

The Proprietor of the NEW YORK LEDGER is gratified at having it in his power to announce in his Prospectus for the new year—1859—that all the old popular and eminent writers of the LEDGER staff have been retained, and new ones added. Among the latter we are pleased to mention the name of the Hon. EDWARD EVERETT, who is to furnish a series of articles to be continued during the coming year, under the title of "THE MOUNT VERNON PAPERS." For these articles alone we have already paid Mr. Everett for the heirs of the Ladies' Mount Vernon Association the sum of TEN THOUSAND DOLLARS.

As an indication of the popularity of the LEDGER, we need only state the simple fact that its circulation is larger than that of any other TEN literary papers in the country. Its great success is owing to the facts that its proprietor secures the best writers in the country, and spares no expense in getting up the BEST FAMILY PAPER—a paper of high moral tone. The exalted reputation of its contributors, the practical and invariably pure and healthy character of all its articles, the care which is taken that not even one offensive word shall appear in its columns, and the superiority of its tales and sketches, have gained for the NEW YORK LEDGER a position that no literary paper has ever before reached. We feel, and always have felt, since the LEDGER obtained its immense circulation, that a heavy responsibility rests upon us, and have endeavored to discharge that responsibility conscientiously, feeling confident that ultimately we should receive the thanks of thousands and tens of thousands of families.

As to the future, we are not at a loss what to say. We prefer to promise rather than to promise. What we have heretofore done is known to our readers; they know what the LEDGER has been, and is now, and must therefore judge what it will be hereafter. We can only say that among the regular contributors to the LEDGER are—

GEORGE D. PRENTICE, JOHN G. SAXE, STEPHENS COBB, Jr., EMERSON BENNETT, T. S. ARTHUR, VIC ROSS WALLACE, CARLOS D. STUART, COL. W. D. PUNLAP, and many eminent Lawyers, Clergymen, Professors in Colleges, and others, who write for the LEDGER anonymously; and that our complete arrangements are such that the current sequence of the LEDGER are now and will constantly be at the rate of over three hundred thousand dollars per annum.

FACTS like these carry with them more weight than any comments that could be made, and common sense will therefore be dispensed with. As we have already intimated, we shall leave promising to those who prefer to expend their force in that way, and content ourselves with doing what we can to make the LEDGER the most interesting and attractive FAMILY PAPER in the world.

MY CHRISTMAS SONG.

CHRIST was born on a Christmas morn,
And this is a Christmas day,
It is clear and cold, and the year grows old;
Soon will it pass away.
"The King is dead—Long live the King!"—
This Christmas day the bells shall ring.

Christ was born on a Christmas morn,
And this is a Christian town,
There's a fair array on bright Broadway
Of the walkers up and down.
God save and bless the merry throng
Whose hearts are filled with Christmas song!

A measure sweet, the beautiful street,
'Tis a poem of delicious rhyme;
The steady flow of the crowds below
Is keeping, keeping time.
Thank Heaven for this, that I belong
Where I can hear such Christmas song!

So here I stand, in this Christian land,
And look at the crowd below,
And amid the throng, as it glides along,
Is a man with locks of snow.
"Oh, beggar, beggar lame and gray,
Hast thou to beg this Christmas day?

"No friendly hand in this Christian land
Has lain in my palm in time;
In a kindly way, on this Christmas day,
Invited thee in to dine.
Oh, beggar, beggar gaunt and gray,
Is this for thee no Christmas day?

"Here I stand with an outstretched hand,
And view my lonely board;
For me doth wait, in silent state,
A dinner for a lord.
Come thou, this day, with me and dine,
And I will give thee rare old wine.

"For I have health, and I have wealth,
And I have friends a score;
The will's my own to dine alone
And drink on days of yore;
And thou, old man, my only guest,
Shall eat and drink this day the best!"

"Oh, stranger kind, the winter's wind
Hath chilled me through and through;
Full many a day hath passed away
Since I was dressed like you;
And many and many a weary year
Since I have seen the plenty here!

"Oh, gorgeous wine! its bubbles shine
Like rubies careless flung;
Each beaker brims with silent hymns
That make my heart grow young.
Oh, stranger, thou art good and true—
Here will I live, and die with you!"

"Drink deep and free till the bottom you see
Of every beaker and can,
And eat of the best as a welcome guest
My jolly and gay old man.
I make thee honored here to-day,
Eat thou, and drink, and go thy way!"

"Oh! false and vain are the hopes I gain
From the blushes of thy wine;
It brings from the dead the hours that fled
Can never again be mine.
Oh! weak, delusive, woeful dream,
How dark it makes the future seem!"

"Adieu! adieu! may the days be few
That thou may'st have to roam!
May it please the Lord of his own accord
To call thee speedily home!
Oh! beggar, beggar gaunt and gray,
'Tis bad to want on Christmas day.

"Christ was born on a Christmas morn,
And this is a Christmas day,
It is clear, and cold, and the year grows old,
Soon will it pass away.
The King is dead—Long live the King!"—
This Christmas day the bells shall ring.

"The fire grows bright, while fades the light
Upon the busy street;
God bless the fire, I'll draw me nigher
Unto its cheerful heat.
The curtains draw and close the blinds,
Keep out the night and wintry winds.

"'Tis good to dine with glorious wine
On merry Christmas day;
'Tis very sad to be ill-clad
In winter on Broadway.
So learn this lesson well, old man;
Get rich as quickly as you can.

"Christ was born on a Christmas morn,
And this is a Christmas day,
It is clear, and cold, and the year grows old,
Soon will it pass away.
The King is dead—Long live the King!—
This Christmas day the bells shall ring."

HOW RICH PEOPLE LIVE IN THE COUNTRY IN FRANCE.

[Our Special European Correspondence.]

"CHATEAU DE W——n, November, 1858.

"YOU are too soon for Paris. You have nothing to do there. Come here and help us to shoot a few hares, and see something of cur vie de chateau in France.

Such was the purport of a letter I received a few days ago, and such the kind invitation which is the cause of my letter being written from this hospitable abode; and I believe my observations from the chateau will have greater novelty than any I could have given you from the streets of Paris. There is really little known of French domestic life in other countries. They so seldom admit strangers to any thing like intimacy, or receive them in their homes—especially their country residences—that even in England there is an idea that French chateaux are gloomy, uninhabitable, uninhabited abodes, where the family live in two or three of the smallest rooms during la belle saison, while Madame receives her paree and her strength for the demands of a Paris winter, and Monsieur looks closely after his fermiers and their crops of corn, or the vineyards and the wine-making. This may be true of those graceless structures which meet the eye in traveling on the high-roads in France, so solemn and deserted, with an avenue of poplars leading to a door which seems as if no one ever had or ever could wish to enter it. But here, thirty miles from Paris, it is very different; and I am surrounded at this moment with every luxury and appliance of comfort that wealth and refined taste can procure. Shall I first describe the chateau or its inhabitants? Place membanus, since they are here in the majority. The lady of the house is still young enough to be very charming, and as Mademoiselle de Z—— had a reputation for beauty and grace not often attained in Parisian circles by the unmarried. The mother and grandmother of this lady, with their servants, are now here on their annual visit of two or three months. Also a married sister, with her husband, and children, and tutor, and governess, etc. I always say there never was a country where there were so many grandmothers as in France. Every one one meets seems to have three or four, whereas in America one knows such did exist, but one seldom possesses them. I am sure I never had any.

My host is a descendant of an old Huguenot family, and himself a zealous Protestant—one of that little band who, landed in the midst of Catholic France, possess much interest for their co-religionists in England and America. I have often said, and the more matter-of-fact and distrustful is what appeals only to the imagination. I wonder whether if Henri Quatre, resisting the promptings of his own sagacity and the persuasions of his counselors, had had as he in early faith, he could not, with his popular qualities, have made it the law of the majority of the kingdom? Edinburgh not; but I have my doubts. The Spaniards and Italians, with their ready faith and dreamy imagination, were natural Roman Catholics; but not so the French. There is a farm belonging to her but which was not an adherent of Mr. Thomas Murray's, the faithful friend and minister of Henry Quatre, and to which Madame de Maintenon often alludes in that charming sketch of her husband's life which has been published, in the quaint old fashion, among the several volumes of a late edition of De Pleins-Murray's papers and correspondence. All are interesting; and particularly the narrative of the wife, which breathes the old Puritan spirit of devotion to duty under every form. The French Protestantism is a class, stood out very distinctly in this country, and with a good deal of the exclusiveness of a body of opposition; the sympathies of those around them, and, indeed, now regarded with much jealousy and even fatally persecuted by the Romish and liberal party. They contain among them some of the most wealthy and intellectually distinguished inhabitants of France, and their moral good conduct and holy and extensive charities would be remarkable even in England, which is supposed to take the lead in these respects.

And now for the chateau. It is in the time and style of Louis Treize, and in length covers a good deal of ground. There is a large entrance-hall, paved with marble, which leads down to the right, left, leading to the principal apartments. The former consist of a billiard-room, then a very beautiful dining-room, the walls hung with old Beauvais tapestry representing birds and flowers, and the ceiling exquisitely painted in harmony with these and the finely-carved oak doors and panels. Separated by corridors is the kitchen, then, also modernized with painted ceiling and walls and oak carvings. On the left are the library, and the sleeping-rooms and dressing-rooms of the family. Those appropriated to guests are on the second story, and very comfortable, with those luxuries held only to be found in France, where the thick mattress of soft wool is made every year. The suite of rooms are very complete, those for ladies having such a dressing-room and a maid's room attached. Those of bed-and bachelors are equally comfortable, and with English sponging bath in each. The country is not very populous near the chateau, although highly so at a little distance; but there is a park with deer and ornamental water, and a kitchen-garden, and what they call a Jardin Anglais—a sort of wilderness of trees and shrubs—and there are walks overseen of old trees, and a carriage-road around, now rich in their autumnal foliage.

We had here yesterday a dejeuner d'adieu, to which all the gentlemen of the neighboring chateaux were invited, and it presented in the guests —as all social gatherings in France—the political changes have been so frequent—a great variety of parties and positions. There was a Legitimist Duke, of one of the oldest and proudest French families, who has enormous wealth, and who, with two or three feudal ancestors of note, has thought built a sumptuous one in this neighborhood. There was a scion of another noble house and historic name, and who was accompanied by a relative who is married to an American lady. He is a good-looking man, and a thorough-paced aristocrat. Sticking adherent of the Orleans family, and several other well-known habitués of the Parisian clubs and beau monde. The usual intelligence which the chateau is eleven o'clock; but to accommodate the supposed eagerness of sportsmen to get to the occasion an hour earlier. It was a regular repast of all the viands of a dinner, with the exception of soup. There was tea, and coffee, and liquors, and ices. Conversation was general and amusing, and the very genial and well-informed host kept it fully all serious or political subjects. The repast lasted an hour, and then we watched the sportsmen off, for, though we called "Au Revoir," they forred the society of the ladies. The shooting here is mostly en battue, which is very unsatisfactory, but perhaps less so for Frenchmen with their military habits. If the word of command is not obeyed, and any one leaves his position in which he is posted, his risk is very great.

I am only performing, of my promise to descant a this letter upon the autumnal fashions which I can attempt, to describe the dress of the ladies of the house, which is always most reflective of that which I had an opportunity of examining upon my return with them to the dejeuner. Madame de B—— chatelaine was in rich brown taffeta dress; the trimming of the skirt was only three bows of wide ribbon, disposed on each side en tablier, and with bows of rich silk cord inside the bows of ribbon. Long hanging sleeves, with inner ones and cuffs of plain cambric, and an embroidered muslin cap, trimmed with rose ribbons and Valenciennes lace, completed her simple and becoming toilette. Her sister, Madame de B——, was in a black moire dress of similar fashion, and a cap with cherry-colored ribbons; and her young daughter, of eighteen, was dressed in a dark-blue taffeta, with what they call a double skirt. I have neither time nor space to describe the grandmamma' dress. Suffice it that it was nicely appropriate to their age.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1858.

THE TRIAL OF MONTALEMBERT.

IN a few weeks eleven years will have elapsed since the outbreak of the last great European revolutionary upheaval. History teaches us that, in Europe, political convulsions are periodical. Their periods can not be calculated with astronomical certainty; because, in revolution, but that the same generation never indulges twice in revolutionary movements. The governing generation of 1848 in all the leading political systems of Europe are so bad that popular outbreaks are the natural consequence of the people; but that, things considered, the people suffering caused by insurrections are so severe that a generation which has once risen in arms against its rulers never desires to repeat the experiment. These, of course, are mere empirical propositions: political science is yet too young to test their accuracy.

Assuming their general correctness, it follows that France is at the present moment not far from a revolutionary crisis. Never, since the first revolutionary outbreak, has France been quiet for eleven years, save only during the long reign of Louis Philippe, and the short reign of Louis Philippe. He had learned so much during his long struggle with adversity, and his long apprenticeship to the throne, that he was able to hold a balance between established authority and popular aspirations for a period of eighteen years, which was very satisfactory to the people. On the contrary, his government was less liberal in 1848 than it had been in 1831. In his maturity and old age he was less wise than he was in youth. Nothing is so much opposition by a semblance of free government as the attempt of such an emblem to enhance itself harmlessly in the papers; he engrossed so much of the public attention by his efforts to make his own power as many popular leaders by a skillful use of money, that he ruled France longer than any ruler since the days of Louis Quatorze. There was no exception to the law of periodicity which seems to govern French politics. It does not appear that the Emperor is following in his track.

For nearly ten years the policy of the Emperor Napoleon III. has astonished and baffled sagacious sagacity. He left nothing to chance. He studied out every combination, watched every turn in European politics, and finally—and a man who disbelieves in Fate; and he was rewarded by a career of absolutely unexampled success. He found himself in 1848 a poor, homeless, penniless, hopeless adventurer; he stove to be President, and was elected; he strove to be Emperor, and was elected; he was disliked the Constitution, and abolished it; he wanted money, and got it; he had an old grudge against Russia, England, and Austria—and made a end of England, and obtained it; he sought to be paramount in Europe, and garrisoned Rome, obtained dependencies in Africa, Asia, and overawed Germany; he craved personal popularity, and won at least an outward show of respect such as he often sighed for in vain when his uncle has enjoyed; there was no object, in short, on which he set his heart that he did not gain. His success in all that he has done, however, the old rule was not at fault. Success proved a worse teacher than adversity; so unbridled a career corrupted and thereby changed his intellect and slackened his energy.

In the month of January of the present year he began to make steps for the modification of regulations with regard to the press which irritated every one without really doing him any good. He imposed fresh restrictions on personal liberty in France. He suffered the army to assume an arrogant and insolent attitude to all subjects of law. He gravely imparted the good feeling existing between himself and the British people, and then fostered a conspiracy for assassination. He embarked in unwise foreign disputes, such as the late quarrel with Portugal. He conferred still further to irritate Austria. And now, last of all, he has prosecuted and procured the conviction of the Count of Montalembert, one of the most distinguished men in France, the head of the French Church, the only man of rank and influence who stood by him on the 2d of December. The charge is simply because the Count had expressed a preference for English liberty as contrasted with French servitude.

These evident errors would appear to foreshadow the operation of the law of periodical revolutions to which we have alluded. But, remember, it may be otherwise. Events may precipitate or may postpone the crisis; but the general explosion of the European affairs should warn all who have interests at stake in that quarter of the globe to prepare, at any moment, for a sudden and overwhelming catastrophe.

THE LATE HOMICIDE AT AUBURN.

THE public are waiting anxiously to hear of some steps being taken by the State authorities in reference to the homicide of the convict More at Auburn. The universal horror which it has felt for the convict himself, it is clear that the power of inflicting death can not be intrusted to an inferior officer of the State prisons, who, in every one knows, are occasionally selected from the least worthy class of the community, and not unfrequently from the very class employed of the penitentiaries. If an angry keeper may put to death a convict with impunity, there is no use in American prison discipline has begun.

No part of the late tragedy at Auburn was calculated to satisfy the public. How came the jury to be composed chiefly of prison contractors? Why was not the doctor's evidence taken, as a matter of course, and as he wished to be? How came the coroner to receive the absurd verdict that the convict's death was "hastened by the blows received from three body keepers" that he was a hale, hearty man before he was placed under the instrument of torture and death?

These absurdities are too glaring to pass unnoticed by an intelligent people. The public journals have appointed a committee of inquiry into the subject; and if the matter is suffered to lie over till the meeting of the Legislature, it will be all the worse for those who now seek to stifle inquiry.

If the prisons of New York are to be more modern editions of the dungeons of the Inquisition, it is right that the people should know the fact before they pay any more money for their support.

THE RIGHT OF VISIT.

WHETHER the right of visitation of foreign vessels in time of war has been abandoned by the British Government, is a question which does not seem to be settled. The Administration asserts that it has been abandoned, and has called on the to verify the nationality of a vessel hoisting a foreign flag. Other authorities aver that the abandonment is only simulated, and that British cruisers will continue to visit American vessels whenever they are so inclined. The assertions of both sides were much encouraged in their belief last week by the news of the boarding of the United States steamer Washington, by Lieutenant Lowry, officers of her Majesty's navy on that station. But it seems from the latest accounts that the British officers, on being called account for their conduct, that Commodore M'Intosh, distinctly disclaimed the pretension to visit American vessels as a matter of right, and asserted that they merely went on board the Washington to ask what the news was. So that, so far as the principle is concerned, the case of the Washington need no further be considered.

The points involved in the controversy between the United States and Great Britain are the visitation of vessels at sea, are very simple and few in number. Great Britain asserts that, as a vessel is not to be exempt from search in her seizure because she may choose to hoist the American flag, a general license may be said to have been granted to pirates; for, heretofore, every pirate will naturally hoist the stars and stripes when pursued, and will thus avoid punishment and impunity. The United States replies, though yielding the point in deference to our Government, still contends that it would be well for the leading maritime nations to agree upon a system under which it should be lawful for the war-ships of any leading nation to visit every suspected ship, no matter what the flag she hoisted. To this the United States reply that the danger incurred by prohibiting the right of search, and by offering an obvious bribe to maritime evil-doers, is less than the danger which would be incurred by giving this from the adoption of a system which would necessarily throw the police of the seas into the hands of Great Britain; for it is not to be supposed that piracy can be revived, as in the present state of commerce it would be very difficult for any pirate to find a port at which he could dispose of his stolen goods; and that, on the whole, we had rather see an occasional sliver or private engage punishment than have our merchant-service navy exposed to detention and insulting search at the caprice of any British naval officer.

Great Britain has agreed to our views, and the search question may be regarded as settled. It remains to be seen how the new plan will work. It is obvious that, at least for the present, it will give a remarkable stimulus to the African slave-trade. Already it is said that the yards in Cuba are busy in the construction of slavers and released through the culpable remissness of the United States officials, has landed a cargo of fine healthy Africans on the Southern coast. In parts of the South the African slave-trade is regarded as a legitimate traffic, which has been temporarily checked. However this opinion prevails there will be no difficulty in finding cargoes of Africans. And now that foreign nations are forbidden to interfere with any ship which owns a set of United States colors, the only impediment to the active revival of the slave-trade will consist in the ability and energy of the national vessels which are detailed to prevent it. Is it presuming too far upon past experience to say that such activity will not prevent the example of the Wanderer from being successfully imitated by other craft?

THE JURY SYSTEM.

THE absurdity of the jury system in criminal cases has again been illustrated in the case of Cancemi the burglar and murderer. This man is a policeman who caught a burglar in the act of robbing a house—shot him dead, and ran away, crying out to his pursuers, "Me no shoot!" He was four times tried and found guilty—twice of murder; the third and last time, through the obstinacy or stupidity of some members of the jury, of manslaughter. The idea of finding Cancemi guilty of manslaughter is too absurd to deserve criticism. The only question for the consideration of the jury was whether Mr. Cancemi the man who shot the policeman Anderson? If he was, he was guilty of murder in the first degree, and of the most aggravated kind; if he was not, he was perfectly innocent, and certainly the most injured man of the day. As to finding him guilty of manslaughter, the jury might as well have convicted him of rape.

Some of the newspapers consider this an instance of the maladministration of justice. In one sense it is so; but not in the ordinary sense in which that expression is taken. In the usual meaning of the words, justice is maladministered here because judges are ignorant, incompetent, or corrupt, and because magistrates interfere to cause criminals from judicial vengeance. But none of the advocates for a reform in the administration of justice have ventured to assail the principle of the jury system.

It is, however, to the defects of the jury system in its application to criminal trials that Cancemi's sentence—and many other failures of justice, for that matter—are due. It is evident that at least some of the men who were sworn on Cancemi's trial were not blessed with common sense enough to see that the man was either wholly innocent or else a most unmitigated assassin. There is no reason to believe that they were exceptions to the common rule of jurors. Every one who has had an enlarged experience of mankind will certify that three out of every five persons who are eligible as jurors are deficient in common sense, even in cases of reasoning, and that nine men out of ten are incapable of weighing the niceties of conflicting evidence, and distinguishing between false and reliable testimony. Yet it is upon the decision of such judges that the punishment of criminals depends.

The jury system has served its purpose in this world. It was invented by our ancestors as a safeguard against royal and lordly tyranny. It was a grand and a manly invention. To have established and maintained it reflects honor upon the people. Many ages may elapse before an innocent man from the vindictive prosecution of the king and his menials. But in our day it is quite out of place. In the days when it was of use judges held office at the pleasure of the sovereign, and would have been dismissed if they failed to render the judgments he desired. In our day, and in this country, there is no sovereign who can private judges to do his will. Judges are at present independent during their term of office. When the Constitution is amended, as it will be as soon as the people of this State have attended to its faults, judges will be wholly independent.

In either case, it would be safer to intrust to them the ultimate decision of criminal cases than it is to have that decision to twelve ignoramuses. They would be more likely, and they would err far less frequently than men who had not their experience to guide them; and it is much less likely that they will, during their training, would be placed in any privilege or passion that to that extensive influences would affect the minds of ordinary men.

These opinions, though by no means new, are not very popular. The time will come, however, when they will prevail; and the jury system, which has long survived its usefulness, will be consigned to oblivion.

THE LOUNGER.

THERE is pleasant news from the venerable Knickerbocker has raised its cudgel against what it will calls The London Assassins, for its uniform sullenness toward American authors. The difficulty with the Athenæum is an old one. It is not aware that the world moves. It does not in the least suspect that American literature may be able to stand upon its own feet. The Knickerbocker looks pleasantly about, and laughs good-humoredly at the clumsy depreciation of the ill-meaning journal.

And why should there be this incessant jealousy and suspicion of American performance on the part of England? It almost seems as if the Englishman, as such, had never ceased sneering away from the leading-strings of the Mother Country—as if he thought there was necessarily but something recilious to all laws in the nature of the new country.

Now it is undoubtedly true that our literature smacks greatly of other influences than the pure American; and the same thing is relatively true of the English, and of all other. The German and French influence are perceptible enough in modern English literature. But the whole spirit of all modern literature, in any country whatever, is the same. It is a human, liberal, spirit; full of sympathy with the human race, and of respect for the individual. There were never, for instance, three more tremendous democrats—and each in an entirely different way—than Carlyle, Buckle, and Emerson; and the popularity of these writers and speakers in this country shows plainly enough the tendency of public sympathy. It is a purely Protestant and hopeful tendency.

Now that there is any kind of development or law in literature the positivist Adversaries never suspects. That a book is any thing more than a certain quantity of paper and more or less ingenious gravity printed upon it, has not yet penetrated the consciousness of the Adversary. Why, it is not yet sharp enough to tell what is going to come from what is not; and actually believes that the books of Sun Slick have some kind of relation to some kind of life or person as some time and place were where upon this continent.

Now that any Englishman should find any fun in the ghastly dreariness of Sam Slick's "humor" is an individual affair. Nobody can justly complain of it, whatever his indignation may be, any more than he can properly complain of the clothes which the individual Bull chooses to wear on Sunday. But that any Englishman in London, with weekly communication across the Atlantic and with plenty of accounts of this country, should really believe that there is any such lingo prevalent here as is printed in the broken dialogues of our books and our doings, is delicious. The English have the best reason to know that we are not natural fools; but they love to see us in the parody that we talk like such.

And with this quality of knowledge, and with no conception of literature as a science, the London Athenæum regularly calls every American book "stupid," "dreary," "dull," and so on. Of late the Knickerbocker recalls the Athenæum's notice of it "Nothing can be more special reading of the Weekly). "After half a column of generalities, without any allusion to the poem at all, it 'strike the whole of it, and 'recall' nothing but the close of the entertainment which, for once, it gives its readers, in this wise: 'The hallucination is said to be a Mr. Butler, of New York; and the Yankee origin is indeed apparent in jests and local allusions, neither very funny nor very intelligible to London readers. But the nonsense, on the whole, is drawn out with much spirit and ingenuity, and that the grave reader may find something in today's number of the Athenæum that he may safely skip—if he please."

If that be not an alarming case of humor, where shall we look for it? If the ton of a lightsome elephant, dancing cheerfully among eggs, there is no such spectacle to be seen.

"There was an old woman of Prague,
Whose words were excessively vague;
When they asked, 'Are those eggs?'
She answered, 'Perhaps.'"

"That oracular woman of Prague."

But, upon the whole, the most modest specimen of Athenæum wit is calling Longfellow Mr. Protracted Fellow.

American publishers are naturally beginning to emit the notices of the A.; from their advertisements, and American authors have learned to survive its sneers. At present the London Athenæum is merely the publishers' circular of the London trade.

PERPLEXITY.

Is it love, or only fancy,
That my life is so shaded
In her being, void of grace,
Wayward, sad, and young?
My life's heaven is strangely ebbed,
Swayed and perturbed by a doubt,
Which, if answered affirmatively,
Over me is hung.

F. G.

DOES F. G. remember
"Could not clear out-how, why some yow so cruelly mock?" etc.

A NEW STATUE.

In Philadelphia there is a new statue, by Steinhauser, already erected. It is a boy playing the violin. The figure is slight, and lightly draped; one hand draws the bow across the violin resting on the heel, with long hair and youthful beauty, is turned upward toward the sky. It might be called Aspiration or Inspiration; for the face and attitude are full of ecstasy. The work is simple and beautiful, and wrought with ease, but without that exquisite finish which distinguishes the best statues both of Crawford and Powers. There is a springing lightness of movement which is very pleasing, as if the force of emotion almost drew the feet from the ground. New-light on a heaven-kissing hill"—is the spirit of Steinhauser's charming fancy, and enchanting its new home.

STATE MURDERS.

Is it generally understood that criminals in our state prisons are to be punished for misdemeanors so severely that they die under the infliction, and the only public critician convicted of a paragraph in some newspaper? Two or three weeks since a stout negro in the Auburn State Prison was "shoveled" for punishment, and although he begged, and promised, and prayed, the torture was so severe that he died in three minutes after it was over.

Nobody is guilty of course. In this sensitive and boasting century and country a prisoner is not left in a moment of that puny ball fairly flickering yonder near the sun, called the earth, and of that dot which I know to exist on it—New York, with its swarm of conceited human atoms."

The Lounger will try to find room next week for the exercise in Saturn's rings—a little rebuke, which our correspondent allowed himself.

—It seems that Henrietta gave Nemo a chaplet of flowers; among them a sprig from a cedarbox, which says, "Touch me not." Thereupon Nemo falls into uncontrollable verse, of which this is a strain:

"I live for thee"—expressive phrase!
Exciting wither and amuse,
That vanquish, lovely cruel hair,
Should thee her love for me declare."

That, also, would appear to be impossible.

"RICHARD, YOUNG, Journal, Boston 4, 1858.

"MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS.—You will confer a great favor on me by letting me know who is the 'Blue Stocking' who wrote the article on Dickens, as given in your Weekly December 4, 1858, page 771.

As a citizen of one of the republics founded by the Liberty Boys, I take an interest in knowing the people and witty writer who has presented your many readers with such a clear explanation of the inner life of that great man.

Yours very truly, C. C. M."

—Hasten de Bolmer, par Gen. Duendorp-Bulstein; contiuuée jusqu'à sa mort, par Alphonse Lefort (Paris, 1858).—Ah, yes!

—This is a genuine challenge, which the Lounger is emphatically glad to receive. He thinks, however, that Chaucer is a good writer, and that Milton has produced some creditable verses:

"CHICOPEE, Massachusetts, December 1, 1858.

"MR. LOUNGER.—I am a lover of the British poets generally, and Chaucer in particular. My means limit me, but every man has his favorites, and I have mine.

"Your correspondent says there are no gentlemen with whom I am very intimately acquainted, though if I see them three times a day I shake hands with them, and observe many new traits in them. Shakespere, of course, we must allow Prince of Poets; that he has numerous faults and blemishes, and that he sometimes sacrifices sense to fancy, is true. Perhaps I have had the pleasure of progressively feasting on the most elegant conceptions of Chaucer's poets. I know that some will question the propriety of placing Milton in the same category, but I dare to be the critic of prejudice.

"I am not versed in the use of language Byron is equal to Shakespeare, and often superior to him; that Hartley is as well read in Shakespeare as he is in Shakespeare; that as a poetical composition, Shakespeare has not written any thing equal to Milton's 'Allegro.' Mr. Lounger, if you decline to answer these, perhaps some Lounger-admirer will favor you with a learned proof and will give the same in maintaining my position.

"BRAND."

—E. A. S., from New Orleans, sings of Autumn:

"Fading
Are the leaves,
The summer's sweet
Bees they'll forsake the parent tree.
Like those who in their time are doomed to be;
Like them our mortal frames are made;
Though we may flourish yet we'll fade."

—The Lounger is greatly obliged to the singingbirds who inspire the aviary of the Letter-box. He does it ever occur to any imparial spectator that lounging, under certain circumstances, must be a serious business?

—Nebuchadnezzar, of "Louisiana," forgets that the Lounger considers that literary inquiry settled.

"MARSHALL, TEXAS, December 11, 1858.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—In your issue of Nov. 27 you speak of the addition of Lyton to the name of Bulwer—as if it were something new; but you seem to give us the idea that he was born 'Edward Lytton Bulwer-Lytton'—a supposition in which you are mistaken. He was christened, I thought that he was born 'Edward Bulwer,' and at manhood added Lytton, thereby adding to his name, as others did 'Sir.' Now, two questions in regard to the wonderful Lounger:

"1st, if the gentleman was born of husband and wife on this country, his surname, as last name, would be that of his father, was this not Bulwer. Why is it not so in Europe? Do they assume both names of their parents, or is it a matter of fancy, or self-privilege?

"Second. What is the rule or law regulating the names of Europe? Are they governed by law, by fashion, custom, &c., and become, and great ones generally?

"DEAR LOUNGER.—If you will inform us on the subject you will do a good service to the young minds who are interested. Yours truly, DAVE FEAR."

—The novelist's father was named Bulwer and his mother Lytton. He was called Edward Lytton Bulwer. Upon the death of his maternal grandfather Edward succeeded to his estate and added the maternal name to his own. He, therefore, became Edward Bulwer Lytton, as in the preface to the "Caxtons," in 1849, where he puts only the initials E. B. L.

—Will N. R., the Lounger's special correspondent from the stars, have patience?

—Forcible Feeble, of Stafford County, Virginia, is a sarcastic wag; but he must not think to hide his light under a bushel. When he asks for the autograph of Mr. Lounger, he must expect the blushing blushes betray him. Could any reader doubt for a moment that the following lines were by Forcible Feeble himself?

"How I love when nobody knows,
As I've heard it said,
Wh' de tid o' me eyas an' de tips er me toes
All turned up to de daisies."

"DARIEN COLLEGE, 1858.

"MY DEAR LOUNGER.—In speaking of Mr. Everett, in the Weekly of November 27, you say, 'He is also an orator of fame greater than that of any American.' Isn't Mr. Everett an American?

"Respectfully, WISE."

—Mr. Everett is an American. The insertion of the word "not" after "any" will perhaps illuminate the difficulty.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Saturday, Dec. 18, 1858.

THE past week has been a quiet one in business as well as in financial circles. Toward the close of the week the exchange stiffened up, in consequence of the want of specie for shipment to Europe, and closed firmly at 1/2 @ 1/3 premium for sterling, and 6.13 @ 6.14 for francs. The drain of gold to the South continues. The only material change in the value of money when we quote at 6 @ 7 cent loans; 4 @ 5 for the best unlisty days paper, on demand; 7 @ 8 for 60 days to 4 months; 8 @ 9 for 6 and six months approved paper.

In the stock department there has, as usual, confined to the members of the Board. There is no material change in prices since last week, with the exception of Illinois Central, which, on reports of great discouragement in England, has fallen from one cent here. The market generally is dull and inanimate.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, Dec. 18, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been rather more active for the week, and without any great fluctuations. Corn, Rye, and Barley have been very lightly dealt in, the prevailing disagreeing almost total inaction in good request at buoyant rates.....A fair inquiry for Pork, Beef, Rice, Tobacco, Sugar, and Molasses, with Spirits Turpentine, Linseed, Lard, and Whiskey at our rates.....Flour has been in fair demand, and prices for Ohio Flour have advanced 10 @ 15c. Market closed heavy.....Hay, Hemp, Seeds, Rice, Tobacco, and Molasses dull.....Tallow was in fair request, and was firmer.....Wool continued in freely demand at strengthening prices.....Cotton has been dull and declining during the week. The demand has been quite limited. Destitute of features. Sales of 1,000 bales at our rates last, and prices of such have been nominal for the week.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CHRISTMAS—GATHERING EVERGREENS.

CHRISTMAS.

In wishing our friends a merry Christmas, we present them with four pictures of the season—gathering evergreens in the forest for chapel or hall room; the Christmas-tree with its wonderful foliage and fruit, more popular among children than the ripest peaches or ruddiest apples: the well-filled stocking at the foot of the bed; and last of all, the Christmas out of doors, with poor shivering creatures cowering under the storm, many of them, perhaps, with "nowhere to go." Let all who propose to spend a merry Christmas at home, with a Christmas-tree and sports of all kinds, think of the poor people who on that Christmas night have no warm fire to sit by, and no home to call their own.

Time was when it was unlawful to keep Christmas in New England. A penal enactment, we are told, actually forbade the pilgrims and their children from keeping Christmas; so closely was the day connected in their minds with the rites of the Church which they had reason to regard as their oppressor. In these Middle States and in the South Christmas Day has always been a popular holiday. Nowhere, perhaps, in the world is Christmas so heartily enjoyed as in New York. Every one remembers the lines:

"Hark! the merry bells chiming from Trinity
Charm the ear with their musical din,
Telling all throughout the vicinity
Holiday gambols are now to begin.
Friends and relations,
With fond salutations,
And warm gratulations,
Together appear;
White lovers and misses,
With holiday kisses,
Greet merry Christmas
And happy New Year!"

It seems a question whether the Yule-log was ever introduced into this country as a necessary part of the Christmas ceremonies. One authority says:

"'Twas Christmas eve! the supper board was spread,
The fire blazed high, with logs of hickory fed."

Others, however, speak of the Yule-log as being

THE CHRISTMAS-TREE.

SANTA CLAUS AND HIS PRESENTS.

selected some weeks before from the forests. It is known that the Yule-log must be something enormous in size—so large as to blaze brightly and fiercely in the hearth until the feast is over. Herrick gives the following song on the subject:

"Come bring with a noise,
My merry merry boys,
The Christmas log to the firing;
While my good dame she
Bids ye all be free,
And drink to your heart's desiring.
With the last year's brand
Light the new block, and
For good success in his spending,
On your paternes play,
That every tick may
Come while the log is tending.
Drink now the strong beer,
Cut the white loaf here,
The while the meat is a-shredding;
For the rare mince-pie
And the plums stand by
To fill the paste that's a-kneading."

The favorite dish for Christmas Day in this part of the world seems to be—as on Thanksgiving Day in New England—roast turkey. It is curious to note, in this connection, that turkeys were introduced into the land of our forefathers contemporaneously with the Protestant religion.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, the 7th, in the Senate, the list of Standing Committees was read and adopted by a vote of 41 to 20. Senator Mason gave notice of a bill to equalize the compensation of our foreign ministers. Senator Clingman introduced a resolution calling for all the correspondence on the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty. Laid over. On motion of Senator Gwin, the Pacific Railroad Bill was taken up by 26 to 15, and a speech thereon made by the Senator.——In the House, Mr. Clay moved a resolution calling for information as to recent British visits of American vessels off Nicaragua. Adopted. Mr. Clay offered a resolution of censure on President Buchanan, censured by Messrs. John Cochrane, Stevens, Reynolds, Adrain, and Houston.

On Tuesday, 14th, in the Senate, a memorial was presented by J. Horsford Smith, praying to be allowed to import iron duty free. The Pacific Railroad Bill was then taken up in connection with an amendment of Senator Wilson to make the road follow the 42d parallel, and was discussed by Senators Stuart, Mason, Shields, Pugh, Iverson, Brown, Foot, Green, Fitch, Gwin, and CHRISTMAS OUT OF DOORS.

Wilson.——In the House, after the reception of various reports, etc., the Watrous impeachment case was taken up, and discussed by Messrs. Ward, Cochrane, Vallandigham, Bryan, Reagan, and Bingham.

On Wednesday, 15th, in the Senate, various petitions were presented. The Senate declined to call up Mr. Clingman's Clayton-Bulwer resolution by 25 to 24; also the Pacific Railroad Bill by 24 to 24; then went into Executive Session.——In the House notices of bills to alter the tariff were presented. The Watrous impeachment case was taken up, and, after a speech by Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, the House resolved, by 111 to 92, that the evidence was insufficient to warrant the impeachment of Judge Watrous. The case of the contested election in the Third Congressional District of Baltimore was then taken up; pending discussion on which the House adjourned.

On Thursday, 16th, in the Senate, Senator Wilson introduced resolutions providing for the election of Territorial officers in Arizona (referred); and inquiring respecting the alleged landing of slaves from the Wanderer. Senator Clingman attempted to bring up his resolution for the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but was opposed by Senator Mason; leave refused by 28 to 22. A speech on the Pacific Railroad was made by Senator Bell. Mr. Townsend Harris was permitted to receive presents from the British Government. Other routine business was transacted.——In the House the Baltimore contested election case was taken up, and, by 108 to 90, Mr. Whyte was allowed to be heard on the floor. A resolution to declare the election void was tabled by 106 to 97. The House having gone into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and the subject of pensions to officers and soldiers engaged in the war of 1812 was discussed by Messrs. Phelps, Savage, Nichols, Burnet, Ritchie, Mason, and Dewart.

THE FIRST SHAD OF THE SEASON.

An affray took place on 18th, in Washington, between Hon. Mr. English, of Indiana, and Hon. Mr. Montgomery, of Pennsylvania. The Times says: "The parties met for the first time this session on Saturday, at the corner of Fourteenth Street and the Avenue. As they approached each other, English, ignorant of any ill-feeling existing, said, 'How are you, Montgomery? I am glad to see you;' at the same time extending his hand, which Montgomery declined, saying, 'I speak to no puppy, Sir!' English immediately struck him with a heavy lignum-vitæ sword-cane across the head, knocking him partially down and into the gutter, and breaking the stick. English stood with a piece of the stick and the sword—which had been drawn, not intentionally, but by the force of the blow—while Montgomery rose with a brick in his hand, which he, however, threw down, and English walked off. After English had gone some fifteen paces Montgomery again picked up the brick and threw it at English, who attempted to dodge behind a post. A piece of the brick struck English's boot-heel, but did no damage.

"Montgomery proceeded to a magistrate's office and procured a writ for English, while the latter returned to his room near by, armed himself, and then continued his walk. Hearing that Montgomery had sworn out a writ, English also proceeded to the office and gave bail for his appearance at court. Montgomery sent English word by the Lieutenant of Police that he would fight him, 'but not with weapons.' Montgomery weighs upward of two hundred pounds, and is regarded the stoutest man in Congress. English weighs about one hundred and fifty."

THE RIGHT OF VISIT CORRESPONDENCE.

We make the following extract from the British Government's dispatch renouncing the right of visiting American vessels:

"Her Majesty's Government, anxious to remove all possible repetition of the acts which appear to have caused so much excitement in the United States, and which might, if repeated at this moment, be detrimental to the good relations of the two countries, have sent further orders to the officers commanding the Cuban squadron to discontinue the search of any vessels of the United States until some arrangement, in the sense I have pointed out, shall be made by your lordship with the United States Government, or declined on their part.

"Should the Government of the United States not think fit to adopt some mutual regulation by which the officers of both States shall be enabled to verify the nationality of a suspicious ship, without offense to its crew or its country, her Majesty's Government will deeply regret that an opportunity has been lost to secure, honorably and forever, the two nations from those vexatious and irritating controversies which are inevitable as long as the letter of international law is made inflexibly to override those measures which experience and common sense recommend as necessary for the security of life and property on the high seas. I am, etc., etc.,

"LORD NAPIER, etc., etc." "MALMESBURY.

THE PRESIDENT'S REPLY.

From Mr. Cass's letter in reply we clip the following:

"The President is aware of the abuses to which the fraudulent assumption of the flag of one Power by the citizens or subjects of another may give rise, and he deeply regrets that the flag of the United States has ever been prostituted to unworthy purposes by such a reprehensible proceeding. At the same time he entertains a strong conviction that the occasional abuse of the flag of any nation is an evil far less to be deprecated than would be the establishment of a pretension like this, which is incompatible with the freedom of the seas. But, while avowing this conviction, he instructs me to say that the United States are not less solicitous than Great Britain that a remedy should be found for this false employment of national colors, to which Lord Malmesbury refers in just terms of condemnation; and the President, though not prepared to make any suggestions upon the subject, is yet ready to receive any propositions which the British Government may feel disposed to make, and to consider them with an earnest hope that the object may be safely and satisfactorily attained.

"But while communicating to his lordship these favorable sentiments of the President, it is due to the occasion to say that there are grave difficulties in the way of reconciling any kind of examination, looking to the detention of vessels, with that entire immunity which is so dear to the people of the United States and so important to all commercial nations. It is a practical question whose solution requires much cautious consideration; and all the assurance that can now be given by this Government is that it shall be discussed with an anxious desire that it may be so adjusted as to prevent the evil to be complained of, while at the same time the ocean shall be left free to the merchant vessels of all nations, each maintaining its own police without the interference with others."

VOYAGE OF THE "WASHINGTON."

The steamship Washington, of the Nicaragua line, arrived at this port last week from San Juan del Norte and Aspinwall. She left New York on the 7th of November, and arrived at San Juan on the 18th; learning there that the Hermann had not touched at San Juan del Sur, she proceeded after a week's delay to Aspinwall. Part of her passengers—such of them as had money to pay their traveling expenses to San Francisco—were taken to Panama and shipped on board the Pacific Mail Company's steamer. The remainder, greatly exasperated and distressed at the treatment they had received, were brought back to New York. While at San Juan the Washington was boarded by two officers of H. B. M. ship Valorous, who questioned Captain Churchill very closely about his passengers, etc., etc. Flag-officer M'Intosh promptly remonstrated against the interference, and a correspondence ensued between him and the British officer in command, which, we are assured, ended satisfactorily to all parties concerned. The presence of Sir William Gore Ouseley on board the Valorous gives an importance to this visit of British officers to an American ship which it would not otherwise possess.

THE CORRESPONDENCE ON THE SUBJECT.

Dispatches from Commodore M'Intosh state that after the steamer Washington was boarded by the British officers, he demanded explanations, when Captain Aldham disclaimed any intention to exercise the right of search, saying he had merely boarded the Washington to get the news; in other words, he had merely made the vessel a friendly visit, the same as our own officers make to British vessels. Sir William Gore Ouseley and his secretary have explained the matter pretty much in the same way. The prominent fact occurs in the correspondence that Great Britain exercises a protectorate over the Mosquito Kingdom. Mr. Ouseley's secretary said the British had abandoned the right of search, and that therefore the visit was not made under it. Commodore M'Intosh thinks the explanation of the British, in respect to the visit of the Washington, satisfactory, frank, and fair.

SENATOR DOUGLAS ON CENTRAL AMERICA.

In the course of a late Southern speech, Senator Douglas spoke in strong terms against the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, by which Great Britain had secured to herself an equal interest with the United States in the affairs of Central America. In the course of these remarks, he related a conversation that once took place between Mr. Bulwer and himself, at Washington, on the subject of the Central American treaty. Mr. Bulwer said he thought the treaty a good one, because it was reciprocal: the two contracting countries had equal privileges. "I agreed," said Mr. Douglas, "to consider the treaty a good one if I could have a little amendment added to it." "What is that?" asked Mr. Bulwer. "Why," said I, "the treaty secures equal rights to Great Britain and the United States in Central America; and after 'Central America,' I would have inserted the words, 'and Asia.'" "But," said he, "you have no interest in Asia." Said I, "you have none in Central America." "But," says he, again, "you have no right in Asia." "Very well," I replied, "and we don't mean that Great Britain shall ever establish any right in Central America."

THE LANDING OF THE "WANDERER'S" CARGO.

The Savannah Republican of 15th says: "The rumor which we announced in the Republican of Saturday relative to the landing of a cargo of Africans on the coast or islands near Brunswick, we regret to learn is borne out by many circumstances, which, though not strictly legal proof, are sufficient to carry conviction to any mind that this unlawful deed has been perpetrated. They were landed, we hear, on Jekyl Island, for which privilege it is said the negro traders paid $15,000, and that a steam-boat from this city went down and brought one hundred and fifty of them past Savannah and up the river to a plantation, from whence they were scattered over the country. It is said the cargo consisted of three hundred and fifty; but it is difficult to believe so small a vessel could hold so many.

"The Wanderer, on leaving New York, cleared for Trinidad, and thence to St. Helena, from whence she now hails, and accounts for being without regular papers now by stating that this Government had no consul there, and she could not obtain any. Captain Corrie has papers purporting to be from the native officials at St. Helena, but they lack the necessary seals.

"The report of the landing having come to the ears of Joseph Ganahl, Esq., District Attorney, he found that three persons had arrived in the Florida boat on Wednesday last. Circumstances directed the suspicions of District-Attorney Ganahl toward them, and he felt warranted in going before Judge Nichols, of the United States District Court, and taking the necessary oath for their arrest. Their names, as registered at the City Hotel, are Juan Bt. Rajesta, N. A. Brown, and Miguel Aguirvi, all hailing from New Orleans. As soon as it was reported around that the arrest had been made, Mr. Ganahl was approached to know what bail was necessary, to which he replied that it was not a bailable case, as the arrest was for piracy. They were put in jail, and, we understand, are provided with every thing of the best."

RETURN OF THE "NIAGARA."

The United States steam frigate Niagara, which left Charleston on the 19th of September, with the Africans taken from the slaver Echo, returned to this port last week from her philanthropic mission. The Niagara arrived at Monrovia on the 8th of November, and landed her dusky passengers at that port, together with provisions, clothing, and other stores furnished for their support and comfort by the American Colonization Society. Seventy-one of the negroes had died on the passage, leaving but 200 out of the original number received on board at Charleston.

SPIRIT-KISSES.

The Pawtucket Gazette relates the following pleasant incident of spiritual communication: "An enthusiastic believer was relating to a skeptic the spiritual performances to which he could testify, and among other things said that on a certain occasion the spirit of his wife, who had been dead several years, returned to him, and, seating herself upon his knee, put her arms around him and kissed him as much to his gratification as she used to when living. 'You do not mean to say,' remarked the skeptic, 'that the spirit of your wife really embraced you and kissed you?' 'No, not exactly that,' replied the believer, 'but her spirit took possession of the body of a female medium, and through her embraced and kissed me.' We presume that believers are often as willingly deceived as this man was."

PERSONAL.

Lieutenant-General Scott sailed last week in the Marion, for Charleston. He declined the military escort which was tendered him the day previous. He was accompanied to the steamship by G. W. Blunt, Moses H. Grinnell, Mr. King, and a few other friends. Unknown to him a squad of the Life Guards, under General Wool, proceeded to the pier, and fired a salute of thirty-two guns when the steamer sailed. Several hundred people assembled and cheered, and the General waved his hat from the upper deck. He goes to inspect the fortifications of Charleston, Key West, New Orleans, and other southern cities.

The trial of Thomas Allibone and Thomas A. Newhall, on a charge of conspiracy against the stockholders of the Bank of Pennsylvania, terminated on Saturday by a verdict of acquittal, given by the jury without leaving their box. The District Attorney abandoned the case, and the court instructed the jury to find for the defendants.

The Washington correspondent of the Boston Journal, referring to the operatic people, writes: "When Lord Napier went to see them, Parodi said, 'We have seen by the papers that you have been in Virginia.' 'Yes,' replied the Minister, 'I can't move, it seems, without having my name in the papers.' 'True,' naively replied Brignoli, 'we public characters are always chronicled.' His Lordship colored and looked unutterable things, while the Italian warblers enjoyed the joke, and have told it on every hand."

A new poem by John G. Whittier, entitled "The Prophecy of Samuel Sewell," is announced to appear on the 6th of January. The Samuel Sewell referred to was an eminent Massachusetts judge, belonging to the period of the Salem witchcraft.

A correspondent of the Vincennes Sun, speaking of the pleasant domestic qualities of Mrs. Douglas, relates that, at the Chicago celebration, Mrs. Douglas was asked how she stood the canvass. "Very well," said she; "but I must go and get my husband some clothes—he has come out of the battle half naked. I got him two dozen shirts last spring, and two or three sets of studs; he lost all his shirts but two, and one that don't belong to him, and all the studs but four, which belong to four different sets; and, besides, he hasn't any of the other clothes that he started out with." His old white hat, however, rode out the storm, dilapidated, but safe.

The St. Paul's Minnesotian of December 4 contains the following item:

"Lord Cavendish, Mr. Ashley, and Lord Robert Grosvenor, about whose safety some fears were entertained, have arrived at Fort Gerry, Red River, in perfect health."

The Albion says that the sole reason of Lord Napier's recall is the delicate health of Lady Napier, who languishes under the trying climate of Washington.

The South Carolina Legislature, on 10th December, elected, on joint ballot, Colonel William H. Gist, of Union District, Governor for the succeeding term of two years. Colonel Gist was for many years a member of the Senate, and in 1848 was Lieutenant-Governor, during the term of Governor Seabrook. We believe that he never qualified as Lieutenant-Governor, but continued in his Senatorial seat, where he served for several years subsequently. Colonel Gist is very widely known throughout the State as a man of high honor and character. The fourth and final ballot resulted as follows: Whole number of votes, 159; necessary to a choice, 80. William H. Gist, 81; James H. Irby, 78.

A correspondent of the Rochester Union writes from New York that "Mrs. Cunningham, of Burdell murder notoriety, and her two daughters are living in an elegant mansion in Twenty-third Street, and apparently in easy circumstances. They give parties occasionally, and 'the head of the family,' it is said, was visible at the Opera the other evening. Augusta was married, recently, to a young Southern planter, and Helen, it is understood, is in a fair way to follow the example."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

SAFETY OF THE "INDIAN EMPIRE."

THE steamship Indian Empire reached Broadhaven, County Mayo, on the 26th ult. All well on board, but her fuel exhausted, and a portion of her cargo and wood-work consumed, and short of provisions. The ship laid to for a week, within a day or two's steaming of Galway, during two furious storms.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

The Tralee Chronicle publishes the following letter from Valentia, dated the 21st November:

"Nothing of importance occurred since my last until Friday, when the weather was so fine that no further pretext could be advanced for not proceeding with the laying down of the shore end of the cable. The vessels accordingly proceeded to sea, and succeeded in submerging the few miles of shore cable, and in making a splice with the deep-sea portion about five miles off Douglass Head. This operation was easily performed, and it is much to be regretted that the remaining seven miles of shore cable left at Greenwich was not brought here and added to the part now laid down. Had this been done there is no doubt but the result would be satisfactory. This is more evident from the fact that, after passing the spot where the shore end terminates, some of the men, in their anxiety to continue the underrunning of the small cable, discovered a 'kink,' having the conducting wire exposed to the water, and, therefore, injuring to some extent the conducting power of the wire. The defective part was immediately cut out. But the underrunning was discontinued, though it is probable that other defects of the kind would have been discovered had they proceeded. This can not be said to be giving the present cable a fair trial. I am not aware that the shore cable has been tested since it was laid down, nor is there any person of sufficient experience here to do so; and when we recollect that some of the most eminent practical electricians of the day have differed materially in the manner and result of their testing, we must have very little reliance on the opinion of others of far less scientific experience. Nothing is therefore known of the present condition of the cable, or whether the laying down of the portion of the shore end has materially improved its condition, as the office has been shut up since the 1st inst., and the staff, with one exception, discharged (not removed to London, as has been asserted)."

FRANCE.

THE TRIAL OF MONTALEMBERT.

The correspondent of the Manchester Guardian writes: "On the day fixed, between nine and ten o'clock, I was one of a small group of men who clustered round the doors of the entrance of the Palace of Justice, in order to be present at the trial of M. de Montalembert. At eleven o'clock we were admitted, and a few minutes after twelve o'clock the proceedings of the court began. The chamber is extremely small, holds about one hundred and fifty people easily, and about two hundred closely packed. I should think we were, altogether, over two hundred. I counted only ten ladies in the trial chamber, including Madame de Montalembert and her young, unmarried daughter.

"In his examination by the magistrate M. de Montalembert, with quiet determination, held to all he had said, but did so without the slightest 'fuss.' In answer to one question put, he distinctly said, 'Yes, I do esteem the political institutions of England preferable to those by which France is at present ruled;' and on another occasion he replied, 'I did and do mean to say that I admire the freedom England enjoys, and regret that France no longer enjoys it also.' At this he was stopped by the President, and told he was repeating the offense for which he was then being tried. He bowed, and said, 'I can not state facts other than as they are.' Moderately and resolutely, with the moderation that belongs to true resolution only, he assumed the entire responsibility of the incriminated act on himself, and said, 'I will take it exclusively if you desire it.'

THE VERDICT.

"When the Judges came back, after a deliberation of one hour and a half, you clearly saw that they felt the falseness of their position. A large body of sergents de ville were marshaled into the court, and the following enormity uttered by the presiding Judge: 'We had counted on the reserve of the public—we have been mistaken; instead of one sergent de ville, we have sent for several. Their duty is to watch every individual present, and if any one makes the slightest sign, to arrest him and bring him before the tribunal.' Thereupon, addressing the policemen, 'Now,' said the Judge, 'place yourselves so as that no one shall escape you, and be vigilant.' These men placed themselves back to back so as to command both sides of the hall, and set-to to 'watch' while the sentence was read, which condemns Montalembert to six months' imprisonment and three thousand francs fine. To this I will add nothing. The crowd went away in forced and breathless silence; but do you think at the bottom of that silence lies any thing suspicious for the existing régime as it is actually constituted?"

A PARDON GRANTED BUT REFUSED.

The Moniteur of the 2d inst. announces that, in consequence of the anniversary of the 2d December, the Emperor relieves M. de Montalembert from the penalties of the sentence passed upon him. The London Times claims this as a triumph of the English Press, but at the same time censures the Emperor for numerous acts of vacillating he has displayed.

M. de Montalembert writes to the Moniteur to the following effect: "I have appealed against the sentence passed upon me. No power in France up to the present time has had a right to remit a penalty not definitive. I am one of those who still believe in the right, and I do not accept the pardon. I beg you, and if necessary, demand you to insert this." A letter from Montalembert to the Archbishop of Paris, published in the Indépendence Belge, declines the Archbishop's intercession for a remission of the penalty. Montalembert lodged a formal appeal against his sentence on the 2d inst.

FALL OF THE EMPEROR.

The French Emperor's horse fell with him lately while climbing a bank in the forest of Compiègne. Both horse and rider rolled to the bottom of the embankment; and the journals being forbidden to mention the matter, it is supposed that his Majesty was severely contusionné; and the suspicion is increased by the seizure and persecution of a poor open-mouthed prophet, who gave warning that, before the year is concluded, "all this will disappear (tout cela disparaitra), and without vengeance, bloodshed, or violence, but by the finger of God alone."

MORPHY'S GAMES.

The Times correspondent says: "Morphy continues to play nearly every day at the Café de la Régence, against all comers, giving odds to the weak, and showing his brilliant points to the strong. Among those he has lately beaten in even matches were M. Ludinski, a celebrated Polish player, who came to Paris expressly, and who got beaten seven straight games: M. Laroche, whom Mr. Morphy declares the best French player, and whom he beat with ease; and M. de Riviere, a player who takes rank next to, if not equal with, M. Laroche, and who, in his various contests with Mr. Morphy, has occasionally beaten him. This M. de Riviere is a brother of your Captain de Riviere, of Blount notoriety. He is a gentlemanly, handsome man, a reporter for the Press, a brilliant chess-player, as we have seen, and, like the Captain, speaks English, their mother having been a Scotch woman. I ought to mention that Morphy has also beaten, with ease, and with great mortification to his adversary, a Frenchman by the name of Erkel, who came and challenged him, backed by a numerous array of friends, with something of the air of mockery with which Goliah defied David. It did not take Morphy long to reduce his bombast to the smallest possible dimensions."

LAMARTINE'S OPULENT BEGGARY.

The Times correspondent says: "We had the melancholy spectacle lately of the millionaire poet standing two hours before the Committee of Relief at a special meeting at the Hôtel du Louvre, explaining in detail the state of his finances. From his own mouth we learn that he has been slandered in the sum of his debts—they are but 2,200,000 francs! Of this he has paid the last year 900,000, so that there remains due but 1,300,000. But what do you think of a man who can pay off in one year $180,000, and who goes begging for money? Is it a beggar or a millionaire that has such brilliant resources at his command?"

THE SCHOOLS' QUESTION IN FRANCE.

A case has occurred in France which has a curious bearing on our schools' question. There is a French law which makes it obligatory on manufacturers to send to school all their factory children who are under twelve. The school is the public one, which is Roman Catholic. Mr. Walker is an English lace manufacturer in St. Pierre, and he has been summoned for having two English children in his service without sending them to school. He pleaded that they were Protestants and the school was Roman Catholic; but the plea did not avail, for the judge, who said that a free school could not be established for every sect, decided against Mr. Walker, fining him six francs and costs, on the ground that the defendant's argument tended to create for foreign Protestants a position which would enable them to compete unfairly with Frenchmen.

GERMANY.

HUMBOLDT PERSECUTED BY A BOSWELL.

M. von Humboldt, it seems, is pestered by a Boswell. A Berlin letter to the Boston Journal says: "A German litterateur, of much dull learning and duller industry, has taken upon himself to be Humboldt's biographer without having any special qualifications for the task. He has attached himself, burr-like, to Humboldt, and will not be shaken off. Every word from the old man's lips, every letter he writes, is eagerly caught up, and chronicled or filed away by the German Boswell."

A LADY FINED FOR WEARING TOO LARGE HOOPS.

The Indépendence Belge states that a young lady, living in Hanover, has been sentenced by a court of that town to pay a fine of two francs "for having worn a dress which, occupying the whole breadth of the pavement, is an obstruction to the public way."

INDIA.

OPENING OF THE CAMPAIGN.

The campaign commenced on the 18th October. The rebels had been dislodged from many strongholds. Several engagements are reported, each resulting in victory on the British side, and heavy losses to the enemy. On the 30th the rebels were defeated near Mood Poor; on the 31st the Fort of Berwha was taken by storm; and on the same day the strong fort of Berra was captured; on the 23d a detachment was assailed by a thousand rebels, but they were repulsed, with the loss of men and guns; on the 27th the fort of Rohes was taken; and on the 29th Benes Madho, with 20,000 men, was captured, with loss.

Tantia Topee was a fugitive, his forces having been routed, with the loss of all their guns and six hundred killed.

The number of rebels was still very large, at the lowest estimate 50,000, but they are scattered about in small bodies.

The proclamation in which the British Crown assumes entire command over India, and promises an amnesty on certain conditions, was read throughout India on the 1st of November, and is said to have given great satisfaction to all parties.

Tantia Topee had applied to know on what terms he could surrender.

TURKEY.

THE SULTAN ON BOARD THE "WABASH."

A letter from the United States frigate Wabash says that, shortly after their arrival at Constantinople, "it was intimated to us that the Sultan himself was coming to visit us. In order to make us appreciate the distinguished honor of which we were to be the happy recipients, we were told that the only occasion on which the Sultan of Turkey ever condescended to visit a man-of-war was many years ago, when a Turkish line-of-battle-ship, commanded by his own brother, entered the port. A second invitation was tendered the Sultan by her captain, but, as it afterward appeared, with the intention of blowing her up when he arrived on board. An accidental circumstance having detained the Sultan—who expected no foul play—on shore, the design to make away with his life was frustrated, but the disastrous destruction of the splendid ship and her crew of 500 souls was accomplished. It need not, therefore, be wondered at that the Sultan entertains a strong prejudice against boarding men-of-war; and the fact that the first breach of this time-honored practice of abstaining from participation in all naval ceremonies, was made in favor of Americans, shows that we can inspire confidence, where nations much older and more experienced in the mysteries of diplomacy are looked upon with suspicion. While our illustrious guest was on board, two vessels, one entering and the other leaving harbor, ran foul of us, and I certainly imagined, by the dismay perceptible on the Sultan's face during the confusion incident to the mishap, that his memory was busy with the conspiracy above referred to, and that it was altogether probable he would not board even a Yankee frigate in haste again. Our officers endeavored to induce him to step down in the ward-room until the vessels would be extricated; but he strenuously refused, and said he would rather remain on deck. His aide, feeling an itching of curiosity, undertook to examine the musket belonging to one of the marines. In letting down the hammer his thumb was not strong enough to ease it gradually, and a smart snap was the consequence; but if the magazine had exploded the poor fellow could not have been more frightened. Every vestige of color left his face, and it was some time before his nerves became settled."

AFRICA.

WHAT OUR SQUADRON IS ABOUT.

A letter to the Herald from the United States frigate Cumberland, now on the coast of Africa, contains the following: "We have now been fifteen months on the African station, of which precisely twenty-two days have been passed on the usual cruising ground for slavers—thirteen of which twenty-two days we were at anchor—and with the exception of the boarding and overhauling of the Cortez, of which daring exploit you received some account last October, no slavers or any other vessels have been boarded by us, nor are likely to be, from present appearances.

"In consequence of the injured health of the ship's company, consequent upon that affair and a boat expedition two miles up the Congo River, it was deemed necessary by the commander-in-chief that the ship should remain three months at Madeira, in order to recruit the health and spirits of the officers and crew after such unprecedented fatigues and hardships—two weeks being the period usually allotted to the other vessels of the squadron. The remainder of the time has been passed at Cape Verde, and now—after an absence of eleven months from it—we are again on the coast of Africa.

"I merely give you this short account to convince your readers how much has been said, and how little actually done, toward contributing any thing to the suppression of the slave-trade. Our squadron on the west coast of Africa has never dreamed of such a thing."

CHRISTMAS EVE.

I.

'Tis the eve before Christmas—come, gather to-night!
The Yule-log dispenses its welcoming light;
The tall, ivory candles are all in a blaze,
And the old hall is ringing with good Christmas lays!

II.

Come one and come all, then, smile in the cheer;
Leave far, far behind the dark burden of care—
Come, bind the green boughs round the wide, glowing hearth,
And join in the revel, the music, and mirth.

III.

The old will be here with their temples of grey,
And the young who have lived in this world but a day;
What with chatting and feasting and merry old song,
The night will pass gayly and swiftly along.

IV.

What reck we of Winter? The tempests may roar,
And the snow-drifts fill up every window and door;
The storm may rave on, but we heed not its din,
Though Winter without, it is Summer within.

V.

Fair fingers are decking with Holly and Bay
The old village font for the Festival day:
With Myrtle and Mistletoe, wreathing in green
The pulpit and chancel, the altar and screen.

VI.

Come all, then, to-night—'tis a season for mirth:
To-morrow we'll bar the door against Sorrow;
When the Magi of old found the long-sought-for boy,
They rejoiced," it is said, "with exceeding great joy!"

C. C. COX.

THE SISTERS.

It was on one of those warm, bright, still summer mornings that always seem to me to belong to the Sabbath, that I, accompanied by my aunt and her husband, for the first time entered the parish church of the pretty village of Greenfield. The appointments of the interior pleased me, and I took my seat with a calm, home-like feeling. I was much charmed with the singing at the service proceeded; and the preacher was an earnest, eloquent man.

I am not conscious of having been inattentive to the duties of the morning, but the eyes will wander sometimes. Just over my head was a pew at the centre division; and in one on the other side of the aisle were two ladies, whom, from the exceeding plainness of their dress, I set down in my own mind as sectarians. The ladies appeared young—that is, relatively—as they stood up at the service proper. The youngest was marked, but not at all disfigured, by the small-pox; and, by the contained closed stylish, yet unaffected, air of the head, and had a pleasing expression of countenance, frequently interrupted by a look of pain. She was evidently an invalid. I was much interested in her. But her sister, as I presumed her to be, I could not understand, and yet her face was one of those which instantly captivate—a fair, oval, almost faultless face, with dark eyes, and glossy-banded brown hair. In fact, it could not have been caused by either the singing or the slightness of the congregation, for neither there was apparently nothing to excite.

My visit was to extend only to a fortnight; three days had already elapsed; and as my sister was particularly engaged on the next day, I went out for a stroll by myself, or at least only accompanied by my nephew, Master Frederick Rawlins, a fine little fellow of four or five. I had wandered through green lanes and over grassy meadows until I began to feel rather tired, and was looking at an inviting group of trees on rising ground, when we suddenly came into a by-lane, in which about a dozen cottages were clustered. Although I knew we must be near home, Frederick first at one house and then at another, purposing to ask for a moment's rest and a glass of water, for the day was very warm.

But one door was closed; at another, a mother was scolding some children; at another, two or three boys, together with an aged man seated in a wicker-chair, were busily employed in some occupation which I could not see, but which, from the plaintive sound of the shrill voices, I guessed to be a well-known ancient, Mr. Morton of Brook Street. He was a plain-spoken, plain-looking man, rather above the middle height, and with singularly intelligent and expressive dark eyes.

He listened patiently and attentively to my statement; and, in reply to the question, as to whether there was any hope:

"It is impossible to say, ma'am," he replied slowly, and as if deliberating, "without seeing the case. Twenty-three years of age, and has had her hearing thoroughly restored but a few years ago: it is a pity I had not been consulted earlier."

"I know nothing of the case, Mr. Morton, but have only become acquainted with the young lady these last two weeks; and besides, my brother-in-law, Dr. Rawlins, is her medical man."

"Dr. Rawlins of Beconsfield—a very clever man. But you see, Miss Rawlins, I have devoted myself exclusively to the ear—that is, to the organ of hearing; and a very interesting subject it is. I assure you, I have had many of the very patients who have been submitted to me as incurably deaf have had in reality no organic defect or disease at all."

As he seemed about starting a hobby, I once resolutely asked when Miss Glenfield could see him.

"Miss Glenfield! She does not belong to the Glenfields of Beconsfield?"

"She is the late Mr. Glenfield's third daughter."

"Well, that is strange. Why, my brother served in the army with Mr. Glenfield; he was a delicate youth, so it was thought the country would be best."

"But Mr. Glenfield is dead, and the two poor girls are left in comparative poverty."

"Dead! Ah! I remember the fover. But the other daughter—is she not deaf?"

"She is not deaf; but, by a strange fatality, she is blind."

"Blind! Poor things, poor things! Well, bring the young lady my morning you choose—that is, before ten."

"But, Sir," I replied, "Miss Glenfield resides at Beconsfield. It will be necessary to appoint some particular morning, when we shall be happy to attend you."

"At Beconsfield! Why, I am going to Beconsfield to-morrow. Mrs. Smith of Oaks Lodge has sent for me. My subject is deafness at her confinements. Hers is only physical weakness. But as I am called in professionally, of course I attend, and perhaps, after all, it is as well. I think your brother attends the family."

"Very likely, Sir. But what about Miss Glenfield?"

"Do you give me her address. I shall have to attend Mrs. Smith at two or three weeks: it will be no trouble to me, you see; and during that time I shall be able to ascertain whether I can do any thing for your friend."

While he was speaking I had drawn out my pocket-book and pencil, and on the back of one of my own cards had written, "Miss Glenfield, Wood Cottage, Wood Lane;" and when he had finished speaking, presented the card and a guinea—the usual fee, I believe, of a morning visitor. He took the fee and the card, and after glancing at them placed both in the pocket of his waistcoat, and then rising as I did, said, "Good day, Miss. I take this fee, Miss Rawlins"—Miss Rawlins! when he had just read, as plain as the engraver could write, "Miss Hill"—"merely by way of testimony that I have undertaken the case; but I take no more. Whatever advice or medicine Miss Glenfield may require, I will see to myself, and, rest assured, I will spare no pains. Good-morning, Miss Rawlins;" and bowing me out, he closed the street-door.

That very morning I wrote to my sister, requesting her to apprise Miss Glenfield of the surgeon's purposed visit, and, if possible, to be on Wards Common the next afternoon; and also to inform me of the result of the interview. In compliance with my request, Caroline wrote that she had come, according to promise; that she had given no decided opinion; that Miss Glenfield had been somewhat unusually well, but that poor Rebecca had been much agitated.

Well, time passed on. Mr. Morton answered somewhat briefly my professional inquiries, till I received a letter from my sister, which rather surprised me. Dear Mrs. Rawlins [she wrote], You could ascertain positively whether Mr. Morton is married or not. I have asked Frederick—he is the only one, I believe, casually; and he thinks he is unmarried. But I want to know positively, because it would be desirable to the consequence frequently than I am sure a case like hers can require. He is a very nice man, I think; but I would be a much sadder thing to have her heart blighted—though, perhaps, it is already too late. If Mr. Martin is not married, I shall not object, except at my home."

I was blunder-struck, and yet not a little amused at the idea of a young girl having her heart blighted by an eccentric surgeon more than twice her age. Amusement, however, to run down at once to Beconsfield—run down as I had promised—and see the artist and Amelia myself. But the Beconsfield visit was not my own; when I went to the station, I discovered I had made a mistake: it was the evening train I had to take for, the other would not depart for two hours. As I stood on the platform, vexed at my stupidity, and hardly knowing how to wile away the time, I saw Mr. Morton accosted by a gentleman, whom, if I had not been addressed as Mr. Morton, I should never have recognized as Mr. Morton. He looked ten years younger than when I first saw him; his dress, too, was more gay, and altogether he seemed to me as happy, and quite a handsome man.

"Just coming from Beconsfield, Miss Rawlins?" said he, taking my hand, and pressing it warmly. "I wonder I did not see you before, but I suppose you must have been in another carriage. All well at home?"

"Quite well, Sir, thank you," answered I, rather distantly. "But how is Miss Glenfield?"

"Very well indeed—getting on nicely. But I see I am detaining you from your friends," as a group of strangers approached to where I was standing; and, nodding and smiling, he bowed, and hurried away. I was vexed; but as I had seen the doctor, what matter was there in my waiting a few hours for the train to Beconsfield?

In the evening, as we were sitting at tea at home, Caroline began the subject of Miss Glenfield's possible cure; and after alluding to Mr. Morton's skill, asked boldly whether he was married.

"Married!" exclaimed my mother, looking up in surprise. "No, Louisa, no. He is one of those old bachelors who are always fancying a wife. Why, Anne lived there as housemaid, and she says he keeps the servants on board-wages, and almost encourages vice."

"I don't know," said I, vexed to hear the Doctor depreciated, "what business Anne has to talk about her master's everyday life. He seems to me a kind and benevolent man."

"He may be, Louisa, in his profession," remarked my father, looking up from his evening paper: "but depend upon it, he is not generally benevolent. Why, I once applied to him myself about the poor Poles, and he refused to subscribe one shilling: he never gave to public charities, he said—nor to private ones either, in my opinion."

All this was nearly conclusive, but I resolved to hazard another inquiry. The next morning I went to a friend of mine who lived in Beconsfield, the vicinity of Regent Street. After admiring her elegant novelties, and attending to a little affair of my own, I spoke of my young friend and Mr. Morton, and then smilingly asked whether she worked for Mrs. Morton?

"Work for Mrs. Morton and her family too," replied my friend; "but not the lady of the aurist, but of his brother, a respectable solicitor. In fact, the Mr. Morton you mean has no wife, and if he had, I am afraid the poor lady would scarcely ever see him. He's never on sailing and struggling her shoulders—for Mrs. Morton tells me he is terribly stingy."

As this confirmed what I had previously heard I felt satisfied, but, before replying to my sister, resolved to call on Mr. Morton myself.

He was at home, and evidently very glad to see me; but when I said that my visit was to Caroline, was very anxious to know when he could pronounce a decided opinion as regarded Miss Glenfield, I could not but be colored, and I assure you rather embarrassed. He paused a moment.

"To tell you, Miss Rawlins," said he, hurriedly, "I should like to finish the cure at home." He hesitated. I looked at him, but comprehended what it meant. I suppose I must have appeared much delighted, for there was no mistaking his meaning. His eyes overcame his hesitation, and he went on, with little circumlocution, to say, that he had conceived a great regard for Miss Glenfield; that he was sure she was the only woman who could make him happy; and that he was very desirous of making her his wife.

I could scarcely restrain my feelings at the idea of poor dear Amelia's good fortune. However, I endeavored to keep my complacidities in check, and to speak in the highest terms of Miss Glenfield's ladylike demeanor, and her amiable and affectionate disposition. "But then," I added, "you know she is poor and friendless, and has a dependent sister."

"As to her sister," replied the aurist, "I like Rebecca exceedingly well: she is a dear girl, and as to their being friendless, between you and me, Miss Rawlins, I don't think that much of a loss. I shouldn't like to be troubled with my bride's list of relations. Again the word wife! but I presume I am safe in continuing: as you have heard anew, I ventured to ask when the wedding was to take place, 'for I suppose,' I added, "Miss Glenfield has given her own already consent.'

"Why, no, Mrs Rawlins; indeed, Amelia has not settled any thing as yet, and seems to have no object. I wanted to have spoken to you or Mrs. Rawlins: I think Mrs. Rawlins must be ill, for I have called in vain several times to-day. I fill up to Mrs. Morton, my brother's wife, and requested her to visit Amelia, telling her that the daughter of the gentleman my brother had served his articles to. And what do you think she said—that she had no idea of visiting such adventurers! That woman shall never cross my threshold again. Miss Glenfield is a gentlewoman, and could not have been used more kindly by Mr. Martin and Mrs. Rawlins manage the affair? I will write to Beconsfield to-night, and request her to call on me to-morrow, although the essential part I consider settled already' and, my dear Miss Rawlins, I will request he arranged as soon as possible, so that I may be able to attend to business as usual. There will be no expense, I assure you, Mrs. Rawlins, in the event of there are two fifty-pound notes for Amelia's wedding-dress, and I will be so glad to see you. Of course, when she is in her own house she will have every thing at her own disposal. And there is another thing, Miss Rawlins, I shall want a bridal companion for her sister when I am from home."

I took the notes in a perfect bewilderment. There was I, a young maiden of twenty or so, presented with a bridal, which would be the first place in a fortnight, quietly arranging with a stranger the preliminaries of the wedding of another.

"I forgot to tell you, Miss Rawlins," resumed Mr. Morton, "that I am going this evening to Mr. Glenfield's to see the young lady's sister. He has shamefully neglected her; but as he is her uncle, and is a respectable man, I will ask his consent to her residing with us. Amelia is attended, if it was only to vex my brother's wife."

I walked home in a dream. Why do romancers puzzle their brains to bring about their consummations by means of extraordinary events and circumstances, when such may take place from the present concentration, my thing wilder than the result? Caroline was in the drawing-room, by whom I had left sitting by their cottage-door, working for bread—the sun in utter darkness, the other daughter—a child—in a cradle, and the blunder itself could not break—behold them now coming back from their sombre prison to wealth, romance, and society; the blind clothed in smiles of happiness, and finding no want of eyes as she leaned on her husband's arm; the deaf with her face in full beam, and the music of all nature in her ears! It was delightful to think of the part I should take in bringing about this consummation; and yet, as I walked, my eyes filled, and in spite of all my efforts, the tears would roll down my cheeks.

Soon after, my own marriage took place, and I was married from Mr. Glenfield's house. At the time—that is to say, in less than a month—I received a letter from my mother, giving me all the news. Amelia was married from Mr. Morton's, received as such attention, and felt almost as much interested in the affair as myself. Mr. Morton was also done in that of one of his own daughters. She added, she was not at all surprised at the interest Mr. Morton took in Miss Glenfield, since it really began to be of your opinion, Louisa, as to his kindness to strangers; and as for his being parsimonious —so far as I have seen—it is rather Mrs. Morton, who will limit the expenditure of the family. I wish you had seen Miss Glenfield in her bridal-dress—she looked so beautiful, so calm, so ladylike. Poor Rebecca seemed to know not what to do; but I had her by my side, and she wept her tears on my bosom. Poor girl! she whispered to me that she thought she could be happier than she had ever really regretted her loss of sight, should she also to see her sister."

THE AMERICAN JACK THE GIANT-KILLER AND THE EUROPEAN GIANTS.

There was once upon a time a little American boy whose name was Jack, or Paul, as some people pretend. This little boy was a very good chess-player; and when he had beaten all the chess-players of his own country, he crossed the sea with his little chess-board, and sent up his card to the great Bull Giant of England, Staunton, and asked him, "Would he be so kind as to play with him?" The Bull Giant, Staunton, was greatly shocked, as you see in the picture, at this impertinence of Master Jack, and went on reading his paper without minding him in the least.

But the great Bull Giant was not the only Giant in England. Other giants stepped up and said they would play with little Jack, and he beat them all. The rains of his victories ran through all the land; the papers were full of them; and the great Bull Giant couldn't open a paper without finding some account of little Jack and his great battles with the chess giants. So now he was much more shocked than before. You see what a pitiful face he has!

What vexed the great Bull Giant the most was the thought that he would be forced to play with Jack at last, and that Jack would perhaps beat him. So, to prevent this, the Bull Giant set to work, might and main, to read Shakspeare. You may perhaps think that this was queer work for a chess giant, and so do I. But the Bull Giant went at it, for all that; and when Jack came back and asked him again, "Would he play a game with him?" he answered, angrily, "that he couldn't think of such a thing; didn't Jack see how busy he was with his Shak-speare?" Here you see him very busy indeed, and I hope it does him good.

Then Jack, finding that the Bull Giant would not play, went away into France to fight the chess giants there. The French giants are mostly large men, with big eyes, and big beards, and big stomachs; and when they saw little Jack, with his little chess-board, and his quiet, modest way, they were taken aback, and could not even keep their pipes alight for staring at him. You see them here taking a look at little Jack, and not knowing what to make of him.

Presently up walks Jack to the biggest of the French chess giants, one Harrwitz, and offers to play him a game. Harrwitz was a very polite man, not like the great Bull Giant, and he answered directly "Yaw!" and sat down to make an end of Jack without mercy. Here you see him beginning to make an end of poor Jack.

But after they had played two or three games, which little Jack won, Giant Harrwitz changed his mind a good deal, and, in fact, suddenly fell very sick. He had a very bad disease, which is a terrible thing for giants—a sinking of the heart, and a weakness in the back-bone; and so of course he couldn't play any more. Here you see the poor Giant Harrwitz suffering terribly from this cruel disease, brought on by his games with little Jack.

By this time every body in France had heard of little Jack, and all the great people asked him to their houses, and the ladies crowded round him and talked to him, and they do say the pretty ones kissed him in dark corners (but this, for my part, I hardly believe); which did not please the French giants at all. But the ladies went on petting little Jack, as you see in the picture, and Jack, they say, went on bearing it in his old, bold way.

The giants, as you may fancy, were mightily vexed at having been beaten by little Jack, and they held a council together to see what could be done. They smoked a great many pipes, and they drank enough beer to float a big ship; but I believe they didn't succeed in finding out any plan to entrap little Jack. You see them here plotting, in a rather smoky and beery way, to circumvent brave little Jack.

So little Jack, having beaten all the giants, and finding no one to play with him, tied a handkerchief over his eyes and offered to play any body and every body blindfold. But the giants have had enough of him; some of them are sick, others are drinking beer and smoking, others are so busy reading Shakspeare that they haven't time to play with him. So ends the story of little Jack the American Giant-killer.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER VIII.

Sophy's claim examined and canvassed.

"I TAKE this moment," said Darrell, when left alone with Waife—(ah, reader, let us keep to that familiar name to the last!)—"I take this moment," said Darrell, "the first moment in which you can feel thoroughly assured that no prejudice against yourself clouds my judgment in reference to her whom you believe to be your grandchild, to commence—and, I trust, to conclude forever—the subject which twice brought you within these walls. On the night of your recent arrival here you gave me this copy of a French woman's declaration, to the effect that two infants had been placed out with her to nurse; that one of them was my poor daughter's infant, who was about to be taken away from her; that the other was confided to her by its parent, a French lady, whom she speaks of as a very liberal and distinguished person, but whose name is not stated in the paper."

WAIFE. "The confession describes that lady as an artiste; 'distinguished artiste' is the expression—viz., a professional person—a painter—an actress—a singer—or—"

DARRELL (dryly). "An opera-dancer! I understand the French word perfectly. And I presume the name is not mentioned in the document from motives of delicacy; the child of a distinguished French artiste is not necessarily born in wedlock. But this lady was very grateful to the nurse for the care shown to her infant, who was very sickly; and promised to take the nurse, and the nurse's husband also, into her service. The nurse states that she herself was very poor; that the lady's offer appeared to her like a permanent provision; that the life of this artiste's infant was of the utmost value to her—the life of my poor daughter's child of comparative insignificance. But the infant of the artiste died, and the nurse's husband put it into his wife's head to tell your son (then a widower, and who had seen so little of his child as to be easily deceived) that it was his infant who died. The nurse shortly afterward removed to Paris, taking with her to the artiste's house the child who in reality was my daughter's."

"It seems very probable, does it not—does it not?" said the ex-comedian, eagerly.

"It seems to me," replied the ex-lawyer, "very probable that a witness entering into court with the confession of one villainous falsehood would have little scruple to tell another. But I proceed. This rich and liberal artiste dies; the nurse's conscience then suddenly awakens—she sees Mr. Hammond—she informs him of the fraud she has practiced. A lady of rank, who had known Matilda, and had seen both the infants when both were living under the nurse's charge, and observed them more attentively than your son had done—corroborates the woman's story, stating that the artiste's child had dark eyes instead of blue; that the artiste herself was never deceived; but, having taken a great fancy to the spurious infant, was willing to receive and cherish it as her own; and that she knows several persons who will depose that they heard the artiste say that the child was not her own. On this evidence your son takes to himself this child—and this child is your Sophy—and you wish me to acknowledge her as my daughter's offspring. Do not look me so earnestly in the face, my dear and respected guest! It was when you read in my face what my lips shrunk from uttering that your emotions overcame your strength, and your very mind deserted you. Now, be firmer. Your Sophy has no need of me—she is under your charge, and your name is cleared. She has found a friend—a protectress—in her own sex. Lady Montfort's rank gives to her a position in the world as high as I could offer; and as to mere pecuniary provision for her, make your mind easy—it shall be secured. But bear with me when I add, resolutely and calmly, that this nurse's attestation is to me a grosser and poorer attempt at imposture than I had anticipated; and I am amazed that a man of your abilities should have been contented to accept it."

"Oh, Mr. Darrell, don't say so! It was such a blessing to think, when my son was lost to me, that I might fill up the void in my heart with an innocent, loving child. Don't talk of my abilities. If you, whose abilities none can question—if you had longed and yearned for such a comforter—if you had wished—if you wished now this tale to be true, you would have believed it too; you would believe it now—you would, indeed. Two men look so differently at the same story—one deeply interested that it should be true—one determined, if possible, to find it false. Is it not so?"

Darrell smiled slightly, but could not be induced to assent even to so general a proposition. He felt as if he were pitted against a counsel who would take advantage of every concession.

Waife continued. "And whatever seems most improbable in this confession is rendered probable at once—if—if—we may assume that my unhappy son, tempted by the desire to—to—"

"Spare yourself—I understand—if your son wished to obtain his wife's fortune, and therefore connived at the exchange of the infants, and was therefore, too, enabled always to corroborate the story of the exchange, whenever it suited him to reclaim the infant. I grant this—and I grant that the conjecture is sufficiently plausible to justify you in attaching to it much weight. We will allow that it was his interest at one time to represent his child, though living, as no more; but you must allow also that he would have deemed it his interest, later, to fasten upon me, as my daughter's, a child to whom she never gave birth. Here we entangle ourselves in a controversy without data, without facts. Let us close it. Believe what you please. Why should I shake convictions that render you happy? Be equally forbearing with me. I do full justice to your Sophy's charming qualities. In herself, the proudest parent might rejoice to own her; but I can not acknowledge her to be the daughter of Matilda Darrell. And the story that assured you she was your grandchild, still more convinces me that she is not mine!"

"But be not thus inflexible, I implore you—you can be so kind, so gentle—she would be such a blessing to you! later—perhaps—when I am dead. I am pleading for your sake—I owe you so much! I should repay you, if I could but induce you to inquire—and if inquiry should prove that I am right."

"I have inquired sufficiently."

"Then I'll go and find out the Nurse. I'll question her. I'll—"

"Hold. Be persuaded! Hug your belief! Inquire no farther!"

"Why—why?"

Darrell was mute.

Waife passed and repassed his hand over his brow, and then cried, suddenly, "But if I could prove her not to be my grandchild, then she might be happy!—then—then—ah, Sir, young Haughton tells me that if she were but the daughter of honest parents—no child of Jasper's, no grandchild of mine—then you might not be too proud to bless her at least as his bride! And, Sir, the poor child loves the young man. How could she help it? And, at her age, life without hope is either very short, or very, very long! Let me inquire! I should be happy even to know that she was not my grandchild. I should not love her less; and then she would have others to love her when I am gone to Lizzy!"

Darrell was deeply moved. To him there was something in this old man—ever forgetting himself, ever so hurried on by his heart—something, I say, in this old man, before which Darrell felt his intellect subdued, and his pride silenced and abashed.

"Yes, Sir," said Waife, musingly, "so let it be. I am well now. I will go to France tomorrow."

Darrell nerved his courage. He had wished to spare Waife the pain which his own persuasions caused to himself. Better now to be frank. He laid his hand on Waife's shoulder, and, looking him in the face, said, solemnly, "I entreat you not! Do you suppose that I would not resume inquiry in person, nor pause till the truth were made amply clear, if I had not strong reason to prefer doubt to certainty?"

"What do you mean, Sir?"

"There is a woman whose career is, I believe, at this moment revived into fresh notoriety as the heroine of some drama on the stage of Paris—a woman who, when years paled her fame and reft her spoils, as a courtesan renowned for the fools she had beggared, for the young hearts she had corrupted, sought plunder still by crimes, to which law is less lenient. Charged with swindling, with fraud, with forgery, and at last more than suspected as a practiced poisoner, she escaped by suicide the judgment of human tribunals."

"I know of whom you speak—that dreadful Gabrielle Desmarets, but for whom my sacrifice to Jasper's future might not have been in vain! It was to save Sophy from the chance of Jasper's ever placing her within reach of that woman's example that I took her away."

"Is it not, then, better to forbear asking who were your Sophy's parents, than to learn from inquiry that she is indeed your grandchild, and that her mother was Gabrielle Desmarets?"

Waife uttered a cry like a shriek, and then sate voiceless and aghast. At last he exclaimed, "I am certain it is not so! Did you ever see that woman?"

"Never that I know of; but George tells me that he heard your son state to you that she had made acquaintance with me under another name, and if there was a design to employ her in confirmation of his tale—if he was then speaking truth to you, doubtless this was the lady of rank referred to in the Nurse's confession—doubtless this was the woman once palmed upon me as Matilda's confidante. In that case I have seen her. What, then?"

"Mother was not written on her face! She could never have been a mother. Oh, you may smile, Sir; but all my life I have been a reader of the human face; and there is in the aspects of some women the barrenness as of stone—no mother's throb in their bosom—no mother's kiss on their lips."

"I am a poor reader of women's faces," said Darrell; "but she must be very unlike women in general, who allows you to know her a bit better if you stood reading her face till doomsday. Besides, at the time you saw Gabrielle Desmarets her mode of life had perhaps given to her an aspect not originally in her countenance. And I can only answer your poetic conceit by a poetic illustration—Niobe turned to stone; but she had a great many daughters before she petrified. Pardon me, if I would turn off by a jest a thought that I see would shock you, as myself, if gravely encouraged. Encourage it not. Let us suppose it only a chance that inquiry might confirm this conjecture; but let us shun that chance. Meanwhile, if inquiry is to be made, one more likely than either of us to get at the truth has promised to make it, and sooner or later we may learn from her the results—I mean that ill-fated Arabella Fosset, whom you knew as Crane."

Waife was silent; but he kept turning in his hand, almost disconsolately, the document which assoiled him from the felon's taint, and said at length, as Darrell was about to leave, "And this thing is of no use to her, then?"

Darrell came back to the old man's chair, and said, softly, "Friend, do not fancy that the young have only one path to happiness. You grieve that I can not consent to Lionel's marriage with your Sophy. Dismiss from your mind the desire for the Impossible. Gently wean from hers what is but a girl's first fancy."

"It is a girl's first love."

"And if it be," said Darrell, calmly, "no complaint more sure to yield to change of air. I have known a girl as affectionate, as pure, as full of all womanly virtues, as your Sophy (and I can give her no higher praise)—loved more deeply than Lionel can love; professing, doubtless at the time believing, that she also loved for life; betrothed too; faith solemnized by promise; yet in less than a year she was another's wife. Change of air, change of heart! I do not underrate the effect which a young man, so winning as Lionel, would naturally produce on the fancy or the feelings of a girl who as yet, too, has seen no others; but impressions in youth are characters in the sand. Grave them ever so deeply, the tide rolls over them; and when the ebb shows the surface again the characters are gone, for the sands are shifted. Courage! Lady Montfort will present to her others with forms as fair as Lionel's and as elegantly dressed. With so much in her own favor, there are young patricians enough who will care not a rush what her birth—young lords—Lady Montfort knows well how fascinating young lords can be! Courage—before a year is out, you will find new characters written on the sand."

"You don't know Sophy, Sir," said Waife, simply; "and I see you are resolved not to know her. But you say Arabella Crane is to inquire; and should the inquiry prove that she is no child of Gabrielle Desmarets—that she is either your own grandchild or not mine—that—"

"Let me interrupt you. If there be a thing in the world that is cruel and treacherous, it is a false hope! Crush out of every longing thought the belief that this poor girl can prove to be one whom, with my consent, my kinsman can woo to be his wife. Lionel Haughton is the sole kinsman left to whom I can bequeath this roof-tree—these acres, hallowed to me because associated with my earliest lessons in honor, and with the dreams which directed my life. He must take with the heritage the name it represents. In his children, that name of Darrell can alone live still in the land. I say to you, that even were my daughter now in existence, she would not succeed me—she would not inherit nor transmit that name. Why?—not because I am incapable of a Christian's forgiveness, but because I am not capable of a gentleman's treason to his ancestors and himself—because Matilda Darrell was false and perfidious—because she was dead to honor, and therefore her birth-right to a heritage of honor was irrevocably forfeited. And since you compel me to speak rudely, while in you I revere a man above the power of law to degrade—while, could we pass a generation, and Sophy were your child by your Lizzy, I should proudly welcome an alliance that made you and me brothers—yet I can not contemplate—it is beyond my power—I can not contemplate the picture of Jasper Losely's daughter, even by my own child, the Mistress in my father's home—the bearer of my father's name. 'Tis in vain to argue. Grant me the slave of a prejudice—grant these ideas to be antiquated bigotry—I am too old to change. I ask from others no sacrifice which I have not borne. And whatever be Lionel's grief at my resolve, grief will be my companion long after he has forgotten that he mourned."

CHAPTER IX.

Poor Sophy!

THE next morning Mills, in giving Sophy a letter from Lady Montfort, gave her also one for Waife, and she recognized Lionel Haughton's handwriting on the address. She went straight to Waife's sitting-room, for the old man had now resumed his early habits, and was up and dressed. She placed the letter in his hands without a word, and stood by his side while he opened it, with a certain still firmness in the expression of her face, as if she were making up her mind to some great effort. The letter was ostensibly one of congratulation. Lionel had seen Darrell the day before, after the latter had left the Home Secretary's office, and had learned that all which Justice could do to repair the wrong inflicted had been done. Here Lionel's words, though brief, were cordial, and almost joyous; but then came a few sentences steeped in gloom. There was an allusion, vague and delicate in itself, to the eventful conversation with Waife in reference to Sophy—a sombre, solemn farewell conveyed to her and to hope—a passionate prayer for her happiness—and then an abrupt wrench, as it were, away from a subject too intolerably painful to prolong—an intimation that he had succeeded in exchanging into a regiment very shortly to be sent into active service; that he should set out the next day to join that regiment in a distant part of the country; and that he trusted, should his life be spared by war, that it would be many years before he should revisit England. The sense of the letter was the more affecting in what was concealed than in what was expressed. Evidently Lionel desired to convey to Waife, and leave it to him to inform Sophy, that she was henceforth to regard the writer as vanished out of her existence—departed, as irrevocably as depart the Dead.

While Waife was reading he had turned himself aside from Sophy; he had risen—he had gone to the deep recess of the old mullion window, half screening himself beside the curtain. Noiselessly Sophy followed; and when he had closed the letter she laid her hand on his arm, and said, very quietly, "Grandfather, may I read that letter?"

Waife was startled, and replied, on the instant, "No, my dear."

"It is better that I should," said she, with the same quiet firmness; and then, seeing the distress in his face, she added, with her more accustomed sweet docility, yet with a forlorn droop of the head, "But as you please, grandfather."

Waife hesitated an instant. Was she not right?—would it not be better to show the letter? After all, she must confront the fact that Lionel could be nothing to her henceforth; and would not Lionel's own words wound her less than all Waife could say? So he put the letter into her hands, and sate down, watching her countenance.

At the opening sentences of congratulation she looked up inquiringly. Poor man! he had not spoken to her of what at another time it would have been such joy to speak; and he now, in answer to her look, said, almost sadly, "Only about me, Sophy; what does that matter?" But before the girl read a line farther she smiled on him, and tenderly kissed his furrowed brow.

"Don't read on, Sophy," said he, quickly. She shook her head and resumed. His eye still upon her face, he marked it changing as the sense of the letter grew upon her, till, as, without a word, with scarce a visible heave of the bosom, she laid the letter on his knees, the change had become so complete that it seemed as if ANOTHER stood in her place. In very young and sensitive persons, especially female (though I have seen it even in our hard sex), a great and sudden shock or revulsion of feeling reveals itself thus in the almost preternatural alteration of the countenance. It is not a mere paleness—a skin-deep loss of color; it is as if the whole bloom of youth had rushed away; hollows, never discernible before, appear in the cheek that was so round and smooth; the muscles fall as in mortal illness; a havoc, as of years, seems to have been wrought in a moment; Flame itself does not so suddenly ravage—so suddenly alter—leave behind it so ineffable an air of desolation and ruin. Waife sprang forward and clasped her to his breast.

"You will bear it, Sophy! The worst is over now. Fortitude, my child!—fortitude! The human heart is wonderfully sustained when it is not the conscience that weighs it down—griefs that we think at the moment must kill us wear themselves away. I speak the truth, for I too have suffered!"

"Poor grandfather!" said Sophy, gently; and she said no more. But when he would have continued to speak comfort, or exhort to patience, she pressed his hand tightly, and laid her finger on her lip. He was hushed in an instant.

Presently she began to move about the room, busying herself, as usual, in those slight, scarce perceptible arrangements by which she loved to think that she ministered to the old man's simple comforts. She placed the arm-chair in his favorite nook by the window, and before it the footstool for the poor lame foot; and drew the table near the chair, and looked over the books that George had selected for his perusal from Darrell's library; and chose the volume in which she saw his mark to place nearest to his hand, and tenderly cleared the mist from his reading-glass; and removed one or two withered or ailing snow-drops from the little winter nosegay she had gathered for him the day before—he watching her all the time, silent as herself, not daring, indeed, to speak, lest his heart should overflow.

These little tasks of love over, she came toward him a few paces, and said, "Please, dear grandfather, tell me all about what has happened to yourself which should make us glad—that is, by-and-by; but nothing as to the rest of that letter. I will just think over it by myself; but never let us talk of it, grandy dear, never more—never more."

CHAPTER X.

Trees that, like the poplar, lift upward all their boughs, give no shade and no shelter, whatever their height.
Trees the most lovingly shelter and shade us, when, like the willow, the higher soar their summits, the lowlier droop their boughs.

USUALLY, when Sophy left Waife in the morning, she would wander out into the grounds, and he could see her pass before his window; or she would look into the library, which was almost exclusively given up to the Morleys, and he could hear her tread on the old creaking stairs. But now she had stolen into her own room, which communicated with his sitting-room—a small lobby alone intervening—and there she remained so long that he grew uneasy. He crept softly to her door and listened. He had a fineness of hearing almost equal to his son's; but he could not hear a sob—not a breath. At length he softly opened the door, and looked in with caution.

The girl was seated at the foot of the bed, quite still—her eyes fixed on the ground, and her finger to her lip, just as she had placed it there when imploring silence; so still, it might be even slumber. All who have grieved respect grief. Waife did not like to approach her; but he said, from his stand at the threshold—"The sun is quite bright now, Sophy; go out for a little while, darling."

She did not look round—she did not stir; but she answered with readiness—"Yes, presently."

So he closed the door, and left her. An hour passed away; he looked in again; there she was still—in the same place, in the same attitude.

"Sophy, dear, it is time to take your walk; go—Mrs. Morley is in front, before my window. I have called to her to wait for you."

"Yes—presently," answered Sophy, and she did not move.

Waife was seriously alarmed. He paused a moment—then went back to his room—took his hat and his staff—came back.

"Sophy, I should like to hobble out and breathe the air; it will do me good. Will you give me your arm? I am still very weak."

Sophy now started—shook back her fair curls—rose—put on her bonnet, and in less than a minute was by the old man's side. Drawing his arm fondly into hers, they descend the stairs; they are in the garden; Mrs. Morley comes to meet them—then George. Waife exerts himself to talk—to be gay—to protect Sophy's abstracted silence, by his own active, desultory, erratic humor. Twice or thrice, as he leans on Sophy's arm, she draws it still nearer to her, and presses it tenderly. She understands—she thanks him. Hark! from some undiscovered hiding-place near the water Fairthorn's flute! The Music fills the landscape as with a living presence; the swans pause upon the still lake—the tame doe steals through yonder leafless trees; and now, musing and slow, from the same desolate coverts, comes the doe's master. The music spells them all. Guy Darrell sees his guests where they have halted by the stone sun-dial. He advances—joins them—congratulates Waife on his first walk as a convalescent. He quotes Gray's well-known verses applicable to that event,* and when, in that voice sweet as the flute itself, he comes to the lines—

"The common sun, the air, the skies,
To him are opening paradise"—

Sophy, as if suddenly struck with remorse at the thought that she, and she alone, was marring that opening paradise to the old man in his escape from the sick room to "the sun, the air, the skies," abruptly raised her looks from the ground, and turned them full upon her guardian's face, with an attempt at gladness in her quivering smile, which, whatever its effect on Waife, went straight to the innermost heart of Guy Darrell. On the instant he recognized, as by intuitive sympathy, the anguish from which that smile struggled forth—knew that Sophy had now learned that grief which lay deep within himself—that grief which makes a sick chamber of the whole external world, and which greets no more, in the common boons of Nature, the opening Paradise of recovered Hope! His eye lingered on her face as its smile waned, and perceived that CHANGE which had so startled Waife. Involuntarily he moved to her side—involuntarily drew her arm within his own—she thus supporting the one who cherished—supported by the one who disowned her. Guy Darrell might be stern in resolves which afflicted others, as he was stern in afflicting himself; but for others he had at least compassion.

Poor Waife, with nature so different, marked Darrell's movement, and, ever ready to seize on comfort, said inly—"He relents. I will not go to-morrow, as I had intended. Sophy must win her way; who can resist her?"

Talk languished—the wintry sun began to slope—the air grew keen—Waife was led in—the Morleys went up into his room to keep him company—Sophy escaped back to her own. Darrell continued his walk, plunging deep into his maze of beechwoods, followed by the doe. The swans dip their necks among the water-weeds; the flute has ceased, and drearily still is the gray horizon, seen through the skeleton boughs—seen behind the ragged sky-line of shaft and parapet in the skeleton palace.

Darrell does not visit Waife's room that day; he concludes that Waife and Sophy would wish to be much alone; he dreads renewal of the only subject on which he has no cheering word to say. Sophy's smile, Sophy's face haunted him. In vain he repeated to himself—"Tut, it will soon pass—only a girl's first fancy."

But Sophy does not come back to Waife's room when the Morleys have left it; Waife creeps into her room as before, and, as before, there she sits—still as if in slumber. She comes in, however, of her own accord, to assist, as usual, in the meal which he takes apart in his room: helps him—helps herself, but eats nothing. She talks, however, almost gayly; hopes he will be well enough to leave the next day; wonders whether Sir Isaac has missed them very much; reads to him Lady Montfort's affectionate letter to herself; and, when dinner is over, and Waife's chair drawn to the fireside, she takes her old habitual place on the stool beside him, and says—"Now, dear grandfather—all about yourself—what happy thing has chanced to you?"

Alas! poor Waife has but little heart to speak; but he forces himself; what he has to say may do good to her.

"You know that, on my own account, I had reasons for secrecy—change of name. I shunned all those whom I had ever known in former days; could take no calling in life by which I might be recognized; deemed it a blessed mercy of Providence that when, not able to resist offers that would have enabled me to provide for you as I never otherwise could, I assented to hazard an engagement at a London theatre—trusting for my incognito to an actor's arts of disguise—came the accident which, of itself, annihilated the temptation into which I had suffered myself to be led. For, ah child! had it been known who and what was the William Waife whose stage-mime tricks moved harmless mirth, or tears as pleasant, the audience would have risen, not to applaud, but hoot—'Off, off,' from both worlds—the Mimic as the Real! Well, had I been dishonest, you—you alone felt that I could not have dared to take you, guiltless infant, by the hand. You remember that, on my return to Rugge's wandering theatre, bringing you with me, I exaggerated the effects of my accident—affected to have lost voice—stipulated to be spared appearing on his stage. That was not the mere pride of manhood shrinking from the display of physical afflictions. No. In the first village that we arrived at I recognized an old friend, and I saw that, in spite of time, and the accident that had disfigured me, he recognized me, and turned away his face, as if in loathing. An old friend, Sophy—an old friend! Oh, it pierced me to the heart; and I resolved, from that day, to escape from Rugge's stage; and I consented, till the means of escape, and some less dependent mode of livelihood were found, to live on thy earnings, child; for if I were discovered by other old friends, and they spoke out, my disgrace would reflect on you, and better to accept support from you than that! Alas! appearances were so strong against me I never deemed they could be cleared away, even from the sight of my nearest friends. But Providence, you know, has been so kind to us hitherto; and so Providence will be kind to us again, Sophy. And now, the very man I thought most hard to me—this very Guy Darrell, under whose roof we are—has been the man to make those whose opinion I most value know that I am not dishonest; and Providence has raised a witness on my behalf in that very Mr. Hartopp who judged me (and any one else might have done the same) too bad to be fit company for you! And that is why I am congratulated; and oh, Sophy! though I have borne it as Heaven does enable us to bear what of ourselves we could not, and though one learns to shrug a patient shoulder under the obloquy which may be heaped on us by that crowd of mere strangers to us and to each other, which is called 'the WORLD,' yet to slink out of sight from a friend, as one more to be shunned than a foe—to take, like a coward, the lashings of scorn—to wince, one raw sore, from the kindness of Pity—to feel that in life the sole end of each shift and contrivance is to slip the view-hallo, into a grave without epitaph, by paths as stealthy and sly as the poor hunted fox, when his last chance—and sole one—is, by winding and doubling, to run under the earth; to know that it would be an ungrateful imposture to take chair at the board—at the hearth, of the man who, unknowing your secret, says—'Friend, be social;' accepting not a crust that one does not pay for, lest one feel a swindler to the kind fellow-creature whose equal we must not be!—all this—all this, Sophy, did at times chafe and gall more than I ought to have let it do, considering that there was ONE who saw it all, and would—Don't cry, Sophy; it is all over now."

"Not cry! Oh, it does me so much good!"

"All over now! I am under this roof—without shame or scruple; and if Guy Darrell, knowing all my past, has proved my innocence in the eyes of those whom alone I cared for, I feel as if I had the right to stand before any crowd of men erect and shameless—a Man once more with Men! Oh, darling, let me but see thy old happy smile again! The happy smiles of the young are the sunshine of the old. Be patient—be firm; Providence is so very kind, Sophy."

White to play and checkmate in two moves.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"PATTERSON" (Philadelphia). Mr. K.'s problem, which you were kind enough to inclose, is so pretty that we can not help serving it up on our gridiron of this week; although, as a principle, we are opposed to two-move positions.——S. L. (Florence). Too late! Will excuse you this once, however, as it is the first time we have caught you tripping. Our readers expect, by-the-way, that you incontinently send us a five-move problem as is a problem by way of atonement.——Solutions to Problem VIII. have been received from J. C. K., "IMPRIMIS," A. G. C. and J. A. C. (Albany), J. D. G. (Cincinnati), C. C. T. (Dunkirk), "SCHACHSPIELER" (Watertown), J. B. K., S. N., W. H. E., F. W. (Philadelphia), T. J. B. (Richmond, Virginia), E. W. N., C. U. MORPHY IN PARIS.—Paul Morphy's chess career partakes of the marvelous in more ways than one. Not alone does he astonish the world by his unparalleled skill, whether exhibited across the board or without any board at all, but those best versed in the statistics of the game are almost as much nonplused by the inconceivable evenness of his play. He is the only chess-player that we ever knew who appears never to make an oversight or a weak move—or if ever, it is once in a moon's age. In corroboration of this statement we append a list of killed and wounded, being a short summary of his doings, so far, during his present sojourn in Paris:

IN ancient days—and no great loss—
They hung the knave upon the cross;
How differently they now behave,
And hang the cross upon the knave!

We thought it not a wonder slight
The ass of Balaam spoke;
Now every ass begins to write,
That ass is quite a joke!

II. THE SATURDAY PRESS is opposed to the whole system of Puffing, and never allows its reading columns to be used for the purpose of serving any private ends.

III. THE SATURDAY PRESS is not the organ of any Bookseller, Publisher, Theatre Manager, or other Advertiser; nor of any clique of Authors or Artists; nor of any other persons except its avowed Editors.

IV. THE SATURDAY PRESS is the only journal in the country which gives a COMPLETE LIST OF NEW BOOKS, or anything like a

COMPLETE LIST OF BOOKS IN PRESS.

V. THE SATURDAY PRESS is the only journal in the country which furnishes a COMPLETE SUMMARY OF LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

VI. THE SATURDAY PRESS circulates exclusively among thinking and intelligent persons, and is, therefore, the

BEST ADVERTISING MEDIUM IN THE COUNTRY

for all persons who wish to reach that portion of the community.

VII. For these and other reasons the Publishers feel justified in saying, that for all intelligent and cultivated persons, there is no more interesting or valuable journal in the country than

THE NEW YORK SATURDAY PRESS.

THE BEST NEW ENGLAND FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

The Springfield Weekly Republican.

Published every Saturday at SPRINGFIELD, MASS., on a large quarto sheet of the size of the leading New York papers, under the editorial charge of SAMUEL BOWLES and DR. J. G. HOLLAND, author of the "Timothy Titcomb" Letters to the Young, "Bay Path," a novel, and "Bitter Sweet," a poem.

This Journal has won a national reputation for its excellence as a general Family Newspaper and its high Political and Literary character. Published in the heart of New England; on a larger sheet and with a greater amount of matter than the Boston weeklies; with a day's later news than the New York and Boston weeklies of the same date; representing more faithfully than those journals can, or profess to do, the distinguishing principles of New England in morals, politics, and religion; and made up with especial reference to the tastes and wants of New England families, whether settled in their original homes, or transplanted to distant portions of the Union—THE REPUBLICAN presents more attractive features for a general circulation than any other New England paper.

PRICE—One copy six months, $1; One year $1 50; sixteen months $2; ten copies to one address one year $12; 20 copies $20—payable in advance.

Early in the New Year (1859), Dr. HOLLAND will commence a new series of special articles, akin to the famous and popular Timothy Titcomb Letters.

THE WEEKLY REPUBLICAN contains each week over forty columns of reading matter, including, All the News of the Week, local, general, and foreign, carefully condensed and arranged for its pages; A review of money and Business affairs, with the latest Boston and New York Markets; A summary and review of religious Affairs; Agricultural Facts and Hints under the head of The Farm and Garden, by a practical cultivator; An Account of all the New Patents and Inventions; Original Boston, New York, and Washington Correspondence; Six or eight columns of independent Editorial Discussions of the Politics, News, and Literature of the day; Original and Selected Stories, Poetry, and Briefer Miscellany, for the Family—making altogether the most perfect, various, and readable Weekly Newspaper published in the country.

☞ THE REPUBLICAN has a large and rapidly growing circulation in New England, New York and the West, and is an especial favorite with emigrants from New England in all parts of the country.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are the most valuable known. How many millions of human beings have been saved by their use from miserable sickness to happy health. Though entirely vegetable and innocent, yet they are searching and sure to be depended upon as expellants than calomel. While sickness is present they are to be used daily. Because the will take any essential or good property from the blood, but actively impart to it vitality and purity. Never suffer no change in diet or especial care against taking cold.

Fevers, Inflammations, Influenza, Colds, Coughs, and especially sudden attacks of severe sickness, often resulting in death, may be warded off by the timely use of, or obliged to expose themselves to the changes of our variable climate, two or three doses of Brandreth's Vegetable Pills cure, save long doctor's bills and life. Let the case occur.

Mr. John Y. Haight, Supervisor of Newcastle, Westchester County, attracted the attention of those friends. He says, November, 1858: "I was about two years ago, much afflicted with a cold and cough. Notwithstanding the best medical advice, continued to severe attacks, and at last was confined to my bed, and considered myself confined to my bed. Medicine and physicians were abandoned in despair. As an experiment, I concluded to try a single box of Dr. Brandreth's Vegetable Universal Pills on an empty stomach, early in the morning. Their effect was felt in a short time, and the energies of my exhausted frame; I feared the worst. I was relieved in a short time from anything I had ever used or heard of. At length this effect ceased, and I seemed lighter and breathed freer. That evening I was indeed actually better, and slept soundly all night. The next day I followed the same course, and took a dose dose of Pills. I continued to take the Pills for the space of three days, and found myself entirely cured. It is two years ago, and I have had no return; my health has been surprisingly good, and I have used no medicine since. I have made this statement in accordance with what I conceive to be my duty."
